mass trade union movement!

For a United Mass Trade Union Movement

The last ten years have seen an historic development—organised black workers taking matters into their own hands. Now there are mighty struggles daily against low wages, rising prices, high rents, fare increases and the whole system of oppression.

In the last two years the numbers in independent trade unions have almost trebled. This is a magnificent achievement in the face of persistent and intensifying police raids, victimisations, arrests, detentions and bannings of trade unionists.

Yet membership of the independent unions is still only a tiny proportion of the workforce. That shows the huge potential of the workers' movement still to be mobilised in organised struggle.

The armchair critics of the working class who argued that workers can never become a match for the power of the bosses' state are having to swallow their words.

The increase in working class activity has polarised the classes in South Africa. Among the blacks everyhody want to define themselves as workers.

The powerful pull of the trade union movement affects the oppressed middle classes. Some are attracted to it by ambition to enhance their own prestige. But the healthiest elements are drawn to the workers away from middle-class strivings for respectability and a privileged place in the sun.

Ever-increasing membership and success in struggle also draw the most conscious youth towards the essential productive and revolutionary force: the working class.

In this period, victories and defeats alike have been a training and a spur for greater organisation and further struggle. The initiative is still moving to the working class.

This weakens and divides the ruling class all the more. They are hopelessly split on the trade union question as on every vital question of the day. In desperation they fall back on their old, futile policies of vicious and naked repression.

This sharpening of class struggle firmly underlines the revolutionary potential of the black workers' movement when organised in mass trade unions behind a fighting programme of working-class demands. But even more important, it stresses the absolute need for unity of trade unions.

Trade union unity is the basis of strength of the working class, for defence and struggle both against the bosses and their oppressive state.

The recent mass arrests, detentions of trade unionists and deportations to the barren ghettoes of the Transkei bring out more clearly than ever that the state is inseparably linked to the bosses and is the ruthless enemy of the trade union movement.

With the migrant workers (the most oppressed mass of the workers and main source of cheap labour for the South African capitalist system) still largely unorganised, workers' unity between migrants and non-migrants is the key to the future strength of the trade union movement.

Already positive attempts towards united trade union action are under way. This is a milestone in the progress of the movement. But much more remains to be done.

What would be the effect, for example, of a national campaign around the demand for a minimum wage as a basis for uniting the trade unions and workers all over the country?

Given a clear lead by the unions on these and other problems, unorganised workers would flock to join the struggle. By launching an all-out drive to recruit the unorganised masses, the independent unions could realistically set themselves the target of a million members by the end of 1982.

United and strengthened, the trade union movement could go far beyond the bosses' fear of a "spate of sympathy strikes". Effective campaigns to force the release of political prisoners, an end to the pass laws and police repression, through all means including the general strike, could then be on the order of the day.

This is the strategic course which comrades of the ANC and SACTU need to explain and promote within the workers' movement.

Such a clear programme of action would unite all the oppressed around the workers' movement, preparing the struggle to smash the capitalist state.

Essential in this struggle will be the development in the workers' movement of a political leadership with a clear programme and perspective which can guide the movement against the bosses and their state to a revolutionary conclusion. This is the task which faces the advanced workers in building the ANC as a fighting mass organisation, above all of the working class.

On this basis every effort towards building the trade union united front would cut short by many miles the road to a successful socialist revolution in South Africa.

Okwenhlangano Ebambheneyo Yamabutho Abasebenzi

Iminyaka elishumi edlulile isibone ukuqhubeka kwezinto okubalwayo— abasebenzi abamnyama bethatha izindaba ezandleni zabo. Manje sekunezimpi ezinkulu mihla yonke ezilwela imiholo eyehlile, ukubiza kwempahla okuqakemeyo, imikhokhelo yezindlu ephezulu, imbhadalo yokugibela eqakanyiswayo, nendlela yonke yokucindezela.

Eminyakeni emibili edlulile inani labantu abakumabutho angabotshiswa ngu hulumende seliphose lakhula okufika kathathu inani lakuqala. Lokhu yikuphumelela okubabazekayo kakhulu phakathi kokuhlukuluzwa njalo-njalo nguhulumende okujulileyo, ukuthunjwa, ukuboshwa, ukuvalelwa emajele ungagwetshwanga njalo nokubanjelwa inkululeko amabutho abasebenzi.

Kepha inani lababhalisa kumabutho angabotshiswa nguhulumende lisase-yingcosana nje yenhlangano yonke yezisebenzi. Lokho kubonisa ubukhulu inhlanganiso yabasebenzi engaba yikho, obusamele bubunjwe empini yokulwela inkululeko.

Abasoli bemindeni yabasebenzi ababephika ukuthi abasebenzi bangephinde bawamele amandia ababusi bakahulumende sebesala beginya amazwi abo.

Ukukhula kwemisebenzi yemindeni yabasebenzi sekusehlukanisa iminde ye Zansi Africa, phakathi kwabamnyama wonke muntu usethanda ukuzitshengisa enjengowabasebenzi.

Amandia adonsayo awamabutho abasebenzi azwiwa langumdeni waba

Inani lababhalisayo elikhula njalonjalo, nokuphumelela kokulwa njalo kudonsela abasakhulayo abavuke engqondweni bedonselwa kusigaba esiyiso esiphumelelayo nesiguqukayo—umdeni wabasebenzi.

Ngalelithuba, ukuphumelela nokwehlulwa ngokufanana kube yimfundo nenqubeta phambili ekukhuliseni ukubumbana nokulwa okuyaphambili. Isikhuthazi silokhu siyikusondelela kumdeni wabasebenzi.

Lokhu kuncibilikisa njalo kwehlukanise umdeni wababusi kakhulu. Batshayana amakhanda bengavumelani ngendaba yamabutho abasebenzi, nangazo zonke izindaba eziqakathekile eziyimbuzo yakulezinsuku. Ekwehlulekeni kwabo babuyelela kuziga zabo ezindala zokuhlukuluza nokucindezela abantu okungenamusa.

Lokhu kucija kwempi yemideni kubonisa ngamandla imfanelo yenguquko yenhlangano yabasebenzi abamnyama, ma ibumbene emabuthweni abasebenzi, bonke bemi ngemva kwamalungiselelo amele ukulwela izifiso zomdeni wabasebenzi. Kodwa into eqakathekile okungaphambili ikuthi iqonqosela imfanelo emqoka yokubambhana kwamabutho abasebenzi.

Ukuhlangana kwamabutho abasebenzi yiwo amandia omdeni wabasebenzi ekuzivikeleni nekulweni lababusi kanye nohulumende wabo ocindezelayo.

Ukuboshwa kwabantu abaningi okusanda kwenzeka, ukubanjwa kwabasebenzela amabutho abasebenzi, nokulahlelwa enkangala yase Transkei kuveza kasobala manje okwedlula kuqala ukuthi uhulumende angeke ehlukaniswe nababusi, nokuthi nguye isitha esibi samabutho abasebenzi.

Abasebenzi magoduka (okuyilo iqembu labasebenzi elicindezelwa okwedlulayo, njalo eliyilo elinika uhulumende we Zansi Africa umthombo wezisebenzi ezibhadalelwa phansi) elokhu ngendlela enkulu engakabumbani, ukuhlangana kwabasebenzi phakathi kwabasebenzi magoduka nabasebenzi nje yiso isivulamnyango samandla azadingeka kunhlangano yamabutho abasebenzi.

Khona manje imizamo ebonakalayo ekuhlanganiseni amabutho abasebenzi isikhanya isondela. Lokhu yisiboniso esihle ekuqhubekeni kwenhlangano. Kodwa kuningi okusasele ukuba kwenziwe. Kungazala nkomoni kambe ma kungaba nemvukela yezwe lonke ilwela imbhadalo engehlanga ngaphansi kwenani ethile — ajengenjongo yokuhlanganisa amabutho abasebenzi nabo abasebenzi ezweni lonke?

Ma bengaboniswa ukhokhelo olukhanyayo ngamabutho abasebenzi kulezi nezinye izindaba ezidubayo, abasebenzi abangakahlangani bangeza ngamandia ukuzangena impi yokuqhubekela phambili. Ngokuthatha imizamo emikhulu ukunxusa abantu ezweni abangakahlangani, amabutho abasebenzi angabotshiswa nguhulumende, yisifiso esingenzeka esokuba nenani lababhalisileyo abafika isigidi ekupheleni komnyaka ka 1982.

Ibambene njalo inamandia, inhiangano yamabutho abasebenzi ingafika khatshana ngaphambi kokuthandabuza kwababusi nge "ncozana yabasebenzi abenza isiteleka ngenza yenzwelo". Imvukela ezwayo

Yiyona le ndiela esicacisiwe engavezwa ngamaqembu enkululeko awe ANC ne SACTU, njalo ikhuliswe kunhlangano zabasebenzi.

Indiela yokwenza izinto ecacile kanje ingahlanganisa bonke abacindezelweyo ngakunhlangano yabasebenzi, ilungisela impi yokuphumelela engadiliza umbuso wenotho.

Okuzadingeka kakhulu ekulweni lokhu yikubumba phakathi kwenhlangano yabasebenzi inkokhelo yepolitiki enendlela yokwenza izinto ecacile, nendlela ebona izinto kahle, engakhokhela inhlangano ma isilwa nababusi nohulumende endleleni egcina ngenguqulo yokuyaphambili.

Yiwolo umsebenzi omkhulu okhangele abasebenzi asebeqhubekile ekwakheni i ANC ukuba yinhlangano elwela abantu ezweni lonke—umdeni wabasebenzi.

Phezu kwalenjongo, wonke mzamo oqhubekela ekwakheni ibutho laba-sebenzi eliyinkokhelo ebambeneyo inga-phungula ngomango omkhulu indlela eqonde enguqulweni ephumelelayo yenhlalakahle e Zansi Africa.

Vir 'n Verenigde Massavakbeweging

Die laaste tien jaar het 'n historiese ontwikkeling gesiengeorganiseerde swart werkers vat sake in hulle eie hande. Daar is nou daagliks geweldige stryd teen lae lone, prysstygings, hoe rent, busgeldverhogings en die hele sisteem van onderdrukking.

In die laaste twee jaar het die aantal werkers in die onafhanklike vakbonde amper verdriedubbel. Dit is 'n groot prestasie gesien die aanhoudende en toenemende polisieaanvalle, viktimisasies, arrestasies en huisarres van vakbondslede.

Tog is die ledetal van die onafhanklike vakbonde nog maar 'n klein deel van die werkmag. Dit wys op die kolossale potensiaal van die werkersbeweging wat nog gemobiliseer moet word in georganiseerde stryd.

Die mense wat die werkende klas uit die studeerkamer kritiseer, en glo dat die werkers nooit opgewasse kan wees teen die krag van die base se staat nie, moet nou hulle woorde insluk.

Die versterkte beweging van die werkende klas het die klasse in Suid-Afrika teen mekaar gepolariseer. Onder swart mense wil almal hulleself nou werkers noem.

Die kragtige trek van die vakbonde het 'n uitwerking op die onderdrukte middelklas. 'n Paar word aangelok deur die ambisie om hul eie aansien te verhoog. Maar die beste van hulle word na die kant van die werkers getrek, weg van die strewe van die middelklas vir 'n bevoorregte plek in die son.

'n Groeiende ledetal en sukses in die stryd trek ook die mees bewuste jeug na die werklik produktiewe en revolusionêre mag: die werkende klas.

In hierdie tyd is oorwinnings en neeriae albei 'n opvoeding vir die werkers en 'n aansporing tot groter organisasie en stryd. Die inisiatief beweeg nog altyd in die rigting van die werkende klas.

Dit verswak en verdeel die heersende klas nog meer. Hulle is hopeloos verdeel oor die vakbondskwessie en alle ander belangrike kwessies. In wanhoop val hulle terug op hulle ou, mislukte politiek van oop en bloot onderdrukking.

Hierdie verskerping van die klassestryd onderstreep die revolusionêre potensiaal van die swart werkersbeweging, georganiseer in massavakbonde agter 'n strydprogram van werkerseise. Belangriker nog, dit lê nadruk op die absolute noodsaaklikheld van vakbondseenheid.

Vakbondseenheid is die basis waarop die krag van die werkende klas berus vir selfverdediging en stryd teen sowel die base as hulle onderdrukkende staat.

Die massa-arrestasies van vakbondsiede en deportasies na die Transkei het die laaste tyd duideliker as oolt laat sien dat die staat heeltemal verbind is met die base, en die genadelose vyand van die vakbondsbeweging is.

Met die trekarbeiders (die mees onderdrukte massa van die werkers en die vernaamste bron van goed-koop arbeid vir die Suid-Afrikaanse kapitalistiese sisteem) nog grotendeels ongeorganiseer, is eenheid tussen die trekarbeiders en ander werkers die sleutel tot die toekomstige krag van die vakbondsbeweging.

Positiewe stappe na verenigde vakbondsaksie is al aan die gang. Dit is 'n mylpaal in die vooruitgang van die beweging. Maar baie meer moet nog gedoen word.

Wat sal die gevolg wees, byvoorbeeld, van 'n nasionale veldtog rondom die eis vir 'n minimumloon as 'n basis om die vakbonde en die werkers dwarsdeur die heie land te verenig?

As daar duidelike leiding gegee word deur die vakbonde by hierdie en ander probleme, sai die ongeorganiseerde werkers toestroom om by die stryd aan te sluit. Deur met alle mag te probeer om die ongeorganiseerde massa by die vakbonde te betrek, kan die bonde hulleself realisties die doel stel van 'n miljoen lede teen die einde van 1982.

Verenig en versterk kan die vakbondsbeweging baie verder gaan as die base se vrees vir "'n golf van simpatiestakings". Die stryd om bevryding van politieke gevangenes en 'n einde aan die paswette en polisie-onderdrukking, met alle middele inklusief die algemene staking, sal dan op die program staan.

Dit is die strategiese rigting wat die lede van die ANC en SACTU binne die werkersbeweging sal moet verklaar en aanmoedig.

So 'n duidelike aksieprogram sal die hele onderdrukte bevolking rondom die werkersbeweging verenig en die stryd voorberei om die kapitalistiese staat te vernietig.

Noodsaaklik in hierdie stryd is die ontwikkeling in die werkersbeweging van 'n politieke leiding met 'n duidelike program en perspektief wat die beweging teen die base en hulle staat na 'n revolusionêre einde kan voer. Dit is die taak wat die bewuste werkers afwag by die opbou van die ANC as 'n vegtende massaorganisasie, veral van die werkende klas.

Op hierdie grondslag sal elke poging om 'n verenigde vakbondsfront op te bou, die pad na 'n suksesvolle sosialistiese revolusie in Suid-Afrika met bale myle verkort.

Build the trade union united front!

By Jake Wilson and Rocco Malgas

Despite sharp crackdowns by the police there has been a magnificent increase in the activity and struggles of the independent trade union movement. Through strikes, and the consolidation of union membership, workers are winning a whole spate of recognition ballots and agreements, shop steward elections and wage increases.

The latest Labour Relations Amendment Bill and the whip of the police, far from taming the movement, have already led to new steps to unite the workers' ranks against the bosses and the state.

The growth of worker militancy comes at a time when South African capitalism is entering a period of crisis following on the general decline of world capitalism. In the coming year it is anticipated there will be no growth in world trade on which South Africa is so dependent.

The world-wide recession has meant increasing unemployment, higher prices, shut-down factories, and cuts in social spending. It has in turn thrown millions of young people into the ranks of the jobless.

But throughout the world, recession has been made even worse by the monetarist policies of many capitalist governments. In Britain Thatcherism (cutting social spending and raising interest rates) has brought about an economic slump even deeper than the depression of the 1930s. Hence the widespread rioting of the unemployed youth. The United States is now on the same road.

Internationally the workers have met the deepening social crisis with an unprecendented increase in trade union and political struggles to defend their living standards against the constant attacks of the decaying capitalist system. These attacks have been marked by many capitalist parliaments frantically enacting legislation to curb the powers of trade unions and outlaw strikes. In America, India, Britain, Nigeria, Sierra Leone and Zambia, for example, trade union controls or arrests are the order of the day.

The trade unions are the first line of defence of the working class against attacks by the bosses and the state. They bear the brunt of the ruling-class attack, but are also a powerful weapon in the hands of the working class to fight back.

In every country of the capitalist world, the class struggle will be driven to new levels of intensity in the period ahead.

It is no different in South Africa. Since the mass strikes of 1973, the bosses and the regime have used every possible measure to frustrate or repress the independent organisation of the black workers.

But there is an added thrust to trade union struggles in South Africa. Unlike in Europe where the trade union movement came of age during the rise of world capitalism, the independent trade unions in South Africa have been born in struggle against a capitalist class which has always been too narrow-based and economically weak to concede the reforms which the workers in Europe have won.

Today the independent trade union movement has entered a period of explosive growth precisely as capitalism in South Africa and on a world scale is moving into decline.

Dependent on cheap black labour and a violent police state, capitalism in South Africa can provide no reforms on any lasting basis. It is this which removes any foundations for stable reformist policies within the unions of the black workers and pushes the mass trade union movement in South Africa in a revolutionary direction.

The ruling class understands this only too well, yet is powerless to halt the forces which are being unleashed by the decline of the capitalist system.

Drastic powers

In its attempts to bring the independent trade unions under control through the whip in one hand and carrots in the other, the Botha regime has got itself deeper and deeper into trouble.

The latest Bill in Parliament is just another attempt to bring the quarrelling between the government, the bosses, and the bureaucracy of the registered unions to an end. But this Bill drops nearly all the carrots intended to encourage registration and vigorously cracks the whip against the independent unions.

Inspectors are provided with drastic powers to search the offices of trade unions, registered and unregistered, and seize documents. All trade unions must have their constitutions available for inspection, as well as their finances and membership lists.

Other controls maintain the ban on strikes and now all trade unions are prohibited from using their funds to support 'illegal' strikes! A further sting is the re-introduction of the liaison committees, called 'works councils', as a weapon against the unions.

Another Bill requires all worker education to be brought under the control of the Registrar of Manpower Training.

This whole parcel of anti-union measures in Parliament, which have been supported by the PFP and NRP, are reinforced by unprecedented police attacks in the factories and townships. Trade unionists in Port Elizabeth, East London, and elsewhere hardly have time to get home before being arrested again.

In East London the Security Police have even drawn up a secret document on how to break trade union power.

The document provides detailed advice to the bosses on how to smash the unregistered unions generally, and particularly "to act as a millstone around the neck of SAAWU and to prevent the acceleration of the success of SAAWU".

In the secret document the fear of the regime of the unions' power to call a general strike shows through!

"Management cannot dismiss the workers because it will not be only one or two firms involved, but the whole of East London. The result is very clear—one would have to give in to the demands of the workers however extravagant or ludicrous these may be"!

The whole document eloquently testifies to the power of the working class when it is organised on an industry and city-wide basis. It proves once again how the initiative is moving into the hands of the black working class.

This power should be multiplied by organisation on a national level!

This decisive shift in class forces confirms the perspective of Marxism that the black working class, organised on a mass basis, will be the main force in the South African revolution.

While in South Africa the political and industrial organisation of the black working class has to be secured on underground foundations, the open trade union movement has a huge potential as a vehicle for mass struggle against the exploiters and oppressors.

Every step forward by the trade unions proves again their capacity to serve as centres of organisation of the oppressed masses.

The independent trade unions are becoming the focus for all the organisations of the oppressed: community organisations, legal defence committees, student groups, rural organisations and eyen some church organisations.

But this power can only be realised to the full through the massive consolidation of the trade union movement itself—through building trade union unity and developing a clear-sighted working-class leadership.

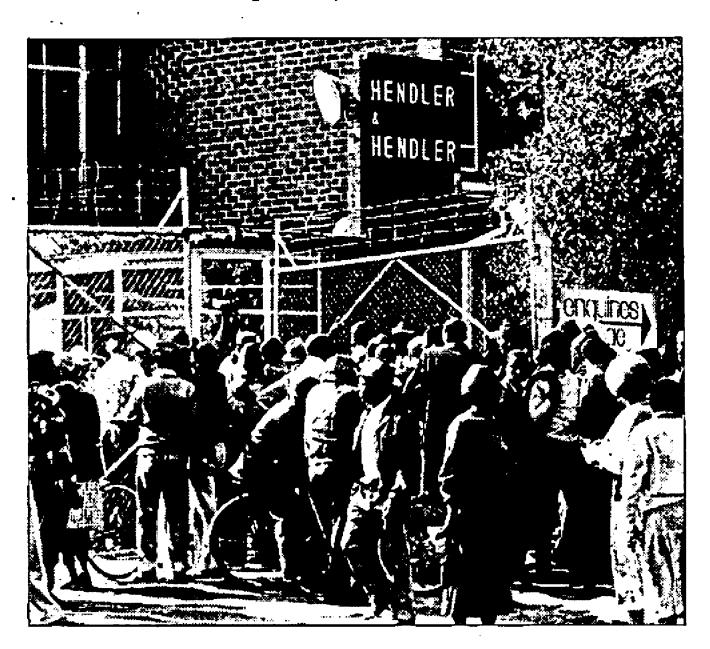

The need for trade union unity is being hammered home by practical experience. In periods of lull, the unions could be picked off and strangled one by one. The confused reaction by some trade union leaders to the issue of registration, with a drift to place themselves under state control, opened the unions to this danger.

But the relentless pressure of the state through the police and laws to extinguish all trade union independence has made it impossible for even these trade union leaders to avoid the question of unity in the struggle to defend their survival.

Common programme

It is this growing confrontation which brought leaders of the independent unions, including SAAWU, FOSATU, GWU, FCWU and CUSA, to a meeting held in Cape Town early in August. The trade union leaders pledged themselves to a common programme of action in opposition to the trade union laws of the regime and the bosses.

The registration of trade unions was rejected "insofar as it is designed to control and interfere in the internal affairs of unions." The unions demanded the right to strike and decided collectively to defy restrictions on strike pay to members. Also the industrial council system was rejected.

And most importantly, the unions decided to establish inter-union solidarity committees in the regions to assist organisation, develop financial support, and organise consumer boycotts.

Despite the limited programme (unfortunately, for example, not every aspect of the new Bill was rejected), the meeting marks one of the most important steps forward in the history of the workers' movement in South Africa.

Tests of strength

The panicky reaction of the Ciskeian puppets to the spectre of trade union unity, by arresting 205 activists from East London, has propelled the independent trade unions further along the road of political opposition to the state.

Despite the previous 'non-political' stance of some of the unions, a joint statement by all those involved in the unity talks condemned the arrests and the whole Bantustan policy of the regime.

But as these arrests show, if we study the situation carefully, the working class is clearly heading towards an inevitable sharper confrontation with the state.

The trade union movement therefore has to take adequate steps to prepare the workers for the tests of strength which lie ahead.

Despite the tremendous step taken at the Cape Town meeting, the defensive pact still falls short of what will be required.

What is needed is a programme of concrete action capable of mobilising the largest possible forces for the struggle ahead. The unionisation of 7% of African industrial workers has been a big stride forward, but the task remains to organise the mass of unorganised workers into a mighty nation-wide force.

The programme would need to be made up of demands on which all the independent unions could agree as a basis for a mass campaign to expand and advance the gains made by the workers.

This can only successfully be decided by full freedom to discuss policy and strategy within the common front around the workers' fighting demands.

With the broadest mobilisation of the rank and file, any differences can be put to the test of experience. This should lead to growing clarity on the direction of the struggle and greater unity.

At this preparatory stage some demands on which the trade union movement could draw in unorganised workers by the tens and hundreds of thousands would be:

- * A basic minimum wage demand of R2 an hour (R90 a week) to be taken into every factory, mine, docks and farm. (The exact demand should be decided with a view to getting the widest possible unity of workers.)
- * Defiance of laws which control the trade unions, prohibit strikes, and divide worker from worker. Now is the time for the initiative to pass into the hands of the workers against the latest Bills. Concrete plans need to be made for mutual defence against arrests, mass dismissals, and deportation of migrant workers.

Particular attention should be given to mobilising migrant workers. No full scale mass campaign is possible without mine workers and the youth.

Steps towards the amalgamation of different trade unions, or towards the creation of a single trade union federation must be supported; this organisational unity will be the stronger, the fuller the agreement on the fundamental questions of programme, strategy and tactics on which it is based.

The growing unity of the workers around the fighting demands of the trade union united front would strengthen the trade unions' ability together to defend workers against victimisation and police harassment.

The solidarity committees agreed upon at the Cape Town meeting, armed with the demands of the united front, could attract thousands of unorganised workers, especially the youth, into the trade union movement.

A target of 1 million members by the end of 1982 would be entirely possible.

The independent union movement would then be on granite foundations. It would then become possible to go further, to take up campaigns against the pass laws, defiance of the migrant labour system, support for 'squatters' against the police, etc.

Trade unionism could then be poised to take on the proportions of Solidarity in Poland—speeding the shift in class forces against the ruling class with the mushrooming of centres of workers' power.

While the trade union united front has the primary task of bringing the organised black workers into action together, it can also draw the youth, the rural poor, and the radicals of the middle class under its banner.

The unity of the black oppressed can only be built around the struggle of the one consistently revolutionary class in society, the working class, which in South Africa also forms the majority of the population.

The trade union united front demands a bold approach to the 272 000 black and 97 000 white workers in the TUCSA unions. Many black members in the textile, garment, distributive, leather, furniture, engineering, and print unions are increasingly unhappy with the close links between TUCSA and the regime, and the "tame" and "sweetheart" union strategy of the union leadership.

These workers should be called to join in the trade union united front, to pass resolutions in their unions, at TUCSA regional meetings, and at TUCSA conferences, in support of the demands and actions of the trade union united front.

In the rise of a mass independent trade union movement lies a basis for eventually breaking white trade unionists from the white trade union bureaucracy, drawing them into the genuine trade union organisation of the masses.

For the revolutionary youth, the task is to integrate its struggle fully with the movement of the working class, to strengthen the workers' organisations, and to fight for a workers' revolutionary programme.

Building the trade union united front in every city, mine, farm, small town, and in the Bantustans themselves, must become the task of every sincere struggler, and every supporter of the ANC. In this way the trade unions will become a key force in the struggle for power by the working class. On these foundations also, the ANC can be built as a mass organisation with a socialist programme.

It is only with this perspective, the self-organisation of the working class, that the foundations will be laid for workers' power and workers' democracy—a workers' state under the command of the miners, dockers, labourers, farmworkers, cooks, etc., themselves.

Let all who support organising the unorganised gather their forces!

Defeat the new Bills by a campaign in the factories, mines, docks, and railways!

Build the trade union united front!

Forward to 1 million!

Youth and Workers Join Forces! By Yusuf Fakir and Paul Storey

Black youth have demonstrated time and time again their willingness to sacrifice their lives to free themselves from racism, oppression and capitalist exploitation.

Capitalism has brought to the overwhelming majority of black youth nothing but permanent unemployment, grinding poverty, gutter education, an absence of sports or recreational facilities, and a bleak future in the prison-like environment of the townships.

Over the past years there has been a constant ferment among the youth, battling for ideas and a correct programme to take the struggle forward.

The problems facing black youth are part and parcel of the national oppression and wage slavery inflicted on the black population as a whole. Experience has begun to drive home the lesson that the power to defeat the regime and change society lies in the hands of the working class.

This growing awareness was reflected, for example, by AZASO's congress in July which recognised capitalism as the root of national oppression in South Africa, and stressed the importance of the trade unions in the struggle for political power.

The youth have begun to turn these lessons into practice. Increasingly they are seeing the need to organise with the workers and give support to strikes.

The mass struggles of 1976 and 1980 have shown how important it is to bring the magnificent fighting capacity of the youth fully into the ranks of the workers' movement. There are hundreds of thousands of militant youth, with undefeated will, burning with anger, who are determined to transform society.

Yet, by their own efforts alone, the youth have been unable to enforce their demands. Through united struggle with the youth, the trade unions should begin to take up these demands.

The youth movement needs to become fully conscious of its working-class roots, and to boldly define itself as the youth arm of the rising labour movement. This will in turn speed up the process of clarifying political ideas among the youth.

Trotsky made a point to young revolutionaries in America in 1938, which is very relevant to our situation also:

"The basic attribute of socialist youth ... lies in the readiness to give itself fully and completely to the cause of socialism. Without heroic self-sacrifice, courage, resoluteness, history in general does not move forward. But self-sacrifice is not enough. What is necessary is to have a clear understanding of the unfolding course of development and the appropriate methods of action. This can be gained only through theory and living experience. The most flaming enthusiasm soon cools off and evaporates if it does not find this timely support in a clear understanding of the laws of historical development."

Therefore it is vital for the youth to take up the study of Marxism in a systematic way. But this should not be approached abstractly. Trotsky speaks of "theory and living experience" which need to be combined.

The essential experience of the working class, which moulds its whole outlook, is the experience of production and of day-to-day exploitation under the heel of the bosses. This experience of the adult workers needs to be absorbed also into the bloodstream of the youth—students and unemployed alike.

It is by participating in the life and struggles of the workers' organisations that the youth can develop their revolutionary capacities to the full. At the same time they will see more concretely how the apartheid system is bound up with capitalism itself, and that unemployment, poverty, migrant labour and influx control can only be overcome on the basis of a planned economy under the control and management of the working class itself.

This will lead the youth movement all the more quickly to openly proclaim the national and democratic demands of our struggle as elements—central elements—of a vitally necessary socialist programme for the revolution ahead.

How can the linking of the youth and workers' movement be achieved practically? An important indicator of the way forward has been SAAWU's call for the formation of a youth section.

The only way for the youth movement to develop now as the youth arm of the workers' movement is to link up organisationally with the independent trade unions. The unions are the way in which the mass of workers are becoming consciously and deliberately organised as workers. They will remain the basic machinery of working-class organisation, and central elements in the struggle for workers' power.

If the workers' movement already possessed its own mass political party, enabling tens and hundreds of thousands of workers and their families to participate regularly and openly in organised political life—then it would be possible to pose the tasks for the youth somewhat differently. Then we could envisage the development of a socialist youth movement directly as an arm of the mass workers' party.

In different conditions, that is the way the movement is developing, for example, in some of the advanced capitalist countries.

Strike at Dominion Dairies, Turffontein

In South Africa, however, that is still the music of the future. Today, the growing independent trade union movement of black workers is laying the foundations on which the mass of the workers will carry forward their struggle, both for industrial and political demands. On this foundation, initially through underground work, the working class will develop its political organisation.

Strongest sides

We think this process will take place round the banner of the ANC, which the workers are taking up as their own. It will also lead, in due course, to the mass of workers flooding into the ranks of the ANC, preparing the way for democratising and transforming the ANC for the tasks of the socialist revolution.

Such a perspective needs to be clearly raised to provide the bridge between the militant black youth and the workers' movement.

It will prove to be no easy task to link the youth movement to the trade unions. Boldness, tact, patience and far-sightedness will need to prevail on both sides. Some young comrades will need to resist the idea that they have a great deal to 'teach' the older workers. Trade unionists will need to guard against a tendency in their midst to conservatism and a narrowness of outlook on the struggle.

Several times over the past five years the youth movement has sprung forward to occupy the centre of the political stage. The youth have achieved an unequalled reputation for militancy and self-sacrifice, and a sense of national unity in a single movement.

In comparison, especially earlier on, the independent trade union movement has appeared to the youth as rather lumbering, and has so far not united its forces under one federation.

At the same time, the enormous difficulty for the youth of laying down solid organisational foundations, or of achieving a single national organisation, has become very obvious. This results from the position of students and youth in society, while the workers themselves, rooted in daily production, naturally build more steady, if more slow-moving organisations, 'from the ground up'.

Today, however, it should be possible to begin to fuse together the strongest sides of both main parts of our working-class movement—the youth and the workers themselves.

This would open the way towards a firmly-based national youth movement, founded on the rock of organised labour. In turn it would add whole batallions of militant young strugglers to the ranks of the trade unions.

But the condition for such a development is the unity of the independent unions.

The youth as a whole will quite correctly be unwilling to be divided into numerous 'youth sections' of the various unions. This would seem a step backwards as far as they are concerned.

Therefore the building of the trade union united front also provides the only route to the creation of a mass socialist youth organisation linked to the trade unions.

To bring this into reality, it is vital for the leaders of all the independent unions and of the youth organisations to hold discussions together towards the building of a national youth movement as a conscious part of building the trade union united front.

The local solidarity committees, called for by the Cape Town conference of independent unions can become concrete bridges between the youth and the workers, discussing how to link the struggles in factory, township and school.

Activists in the trade unions and the youth organisations should explain these tasks to their fellows in order to commit their organisations to such a course of action.

Here, too, the emphasis needs to be placed on a programme of action, round specific demands on which there is general agreement, to mobilise the youth and workers together:

- * Free and compulsory education
- Training facilities for all workers;
- * Special leave for all workers as of right to improve their qualifications and develop skills;

- * A minimum starting wage of R90 a week for all workers;
- * Unemployment benefits equal to the minimum wage for all who cannot find suitable work:
- * The provision of adequate housing for all and the removal of all restriction on residence.

These are the kind of demands around which united campaigns can be prepared.

With campaigns on this basis, hundreds of thousands of young workers and unemployed youth and students who are as yet unorganised could be attracted. The youth movement could serve as a vehicle by which whole new layers of working-class youth are drawn into the organised labour movement, swelling its ranks and transforming the unions themselves.

United in action, the movement of the workers and youth together can prepare the way to blow the apartheid system to shreds.

No to capitalist courts

By Gerald Desai

The present period of struggle by the working class in South Africa is characterised not only by increased militancy and frequency of strikes but also by a deepening of the consciousness of the class.

An example of this was the municipal workers' strike led by the Black Municipal Workers Union in July last year, which is credited with being the biggest strike against a single employer in the history of South Africa. More than 10 000 workers, migrant and non-migrant, were involved in the strike.

During the strike another myth of the petty-bourgeoisie, that is, that the migrant workers are mere sheep who cannot be organised, was exploded. The organisers of the BMWU organised the migrant workers, though physically separated into 19 different compounds of the Johannesburg City Council (J.C.C.), into the trade union.

One of the characteristics which ran through the method of organisation of the union was the element of democracy. Not only were the steering committee members elected by the workers but there was always discussion and consultation between the union leaders and the rank and file. Even at the height of the strike in July 1980, democracy was not suspended. The leadership maintained contact with the rank and file through the shop stewards.

Unfortunately recent developments in the union appear to be bucking the trend of democracy. Recently the union had difficulties resulting in disputes which were settled in bourgeois courts of law. The question this raises is: is court and police action the only way these disputes can be settled?

These courts are instruments of bourgeois rule. Workers' organisations must remain independent of the blood-soaked hands of the state. Lenin, in an article on 'the political danger of splits in the trade union movement' warned that 'a minute difference may become dangerous and even fatal if it festers and blood-poisoning sets in.'

The workers' movement itself must develop the means for settling such disputes. If the union executive is unable to solve disputes between the leadership, the question should be taken to the rank and file. If any judge is needed, this should come from the leadership forged in the struggle: from among trusted and experienced leaders in the trade union movement. In discussion with the workers, a workers' court could be set up to decide the issues in detail.

It is important that in settling these disputes the rank and file of the workers finally should decide on each question. This practice will provide the basis in preparing the working class for their task of securing the progress and well being of the whole of mankind.

Zimbabwe workers deported

As far as the South African bosses are concerned, Mugabe's rise to premiership was cause for dismay. After all, this occurred within their "sphere of influence" and they reason that a black man of any state within this sphere should arrive at premiership only as an "exempted native". Hence the Muzorewa phase of Zimbabwe/Rhodesia.

The South African bosses see Mugabe covered with dust kicked up by the masses on their way to the polls. His "pragmatism" has not done enough to wear off this dust. They are now hell-bent on "cutting him down to size" and attacking the gains of the Zimbabwean revolution by measures to destabilise the economy, including the creation of 20 000 unemployed Zimbabwean workers, who have been "repatriated" from South Africa.

In return for the superprofits that have been extracted from their labour in South Africa, the Zimbabwean workers are now presented with a "No Vacancy" sign, and told to "go home".

In this epoch of capitalist decline and increasing unemployment, the bosses in South Africa will axe all the more savagely the jobs of the Southern African toiling masses. Nor, along the road of "pragmatic" accommodation to capitalism is there any chance of jobs for all in Zimbabwe.

The only way the Zimbabwean migrant workers can defend their jobs against the axe wielded by the capitalists is through a struggle hand-in-hand not only with the South African workers, but also with workers from all over Southern Africa.

Only the unity of the working class of Southern Africa can win the struggle for jobs and the riddance of not only passes, but passports too. The Zimbabwean migrant workers have contributed to building the wealth of South Africa—the liberation of South Africa will allow this wealth to be put to the benefit not only of South Africa, but of Southern Africa as a whole.

Organise the unemployed

In a secret document produced by the Security Police in East London on how to break the growing power of the organised black workers, the bosses are urged to take "uniform action" against SAAWU.

The Security Police's most 'brilliant' proposal is that each employer should keep a list of unemployed workers to be able to fire the workers and re-staff whole factories where demands are put forward!

The document shows the vicious plans of the police and the bosses to attack the gains being made in the factories.

It also shows that the independent unions should move without delay to defend the workers in a way that has become indispensible—by organising the unemployed on a nation-wide basis.

With the mass organisation of the unemployed, the workers in the factories will be able to build up their defences against mass firings. The unions, rallying their forces in mass meetings, will be in a stronger position to take up the struggle for jobs for all.

Under capitalism the more than 2 000 000 unemployed workers have no future. The trade union leadership should serve their interests by developing a programme of demands to unite the employed and unemployed in a common struggle against the bosses and their regime.

MOZAMBIQUE and the Southern African Revolution

By Zakes Ramushu
and
Richard Monroe

The explosive march to victory of Frelimo in 1974-75 was like a million-volt flash of lightning. It broke the rusted iron grip of Portuguese colonial dictatorship around the necks and ankles of the people, and lifted their enslavement to monopoly capitalism.

The victory of the Mozambican masses, together with that in Angola, was a giant leap forward for Southern Africa. For the first time colonialism and capitalism were swept aside under the noses of the South African ruling class.

These victories have reverberated through the region, an inspiring source of strength to the continuing struggles of the workers and peasants.

Yet Frelimo has inherited an economic skeleton of absolute backwardness. What basis exists within Mozambique itself—even with the totally changed system of nationalised property, industry and trade and economic planning—for advancing the conditions of life of the masses? What is the way forward for the workers and peasants of Mozambique?

To answer these questions we need first to understand the history of colonial and monopoly-capitalist plunder in Mozambique.

Since the Second World War, the huge struggles of the colonial peoples have forced imperialism on the retreat and snapped the chains of direct colonial rule. Why did the Portuguese ruling class cling to its colonies to the bitter end against the revolt of the masses?

Because, having been the first of the colonial adventurers, it became the weakest of the colonial powers.

From the fifteenth century to 1974 the history of Portuguese colonialism in Mozambique was that of unrelieved domination by the sword over an increasingly pauperised people. The settler system created by the 17th and 18th centuries was a thousand times bloodier than feudalism.

The Portuguese landlord was the complete expression of vicious colonial dictatorship and greed, with both feet on the back of an unlimited supply of chained labour. Land ownership and the seizure of slaves were one and the same.

The official Portuguese administration of Mozambique, from 1884, rested on this heritage. The weak Portuguese capitalist class, overshadowed by British and South African monopoly capitalism, played the role of policeman for foreign investors and concessionaries.

Resting on the settler landowners, there developed a police state machinery which hastened the dispossession of the Mozambican, tribes. The combined force of the whip and monstrous tax systems constituted the functioning basis of Portuguese colonial policy.

From the beginning of Portuguese colonialism forced labour was the norm in all spheres of production. In addition to producing their own subsistence, the law decreed that all men had to produce surplus for their oppressors for six months every year. The enforcement of this law achieved the devastation of communal tribal agriculture, created the basis for limitless labour exploitation, and provided a fount of taxation.

The basis of the economy was the parasitic extraction of wealth from the coerced labour force. Concessions to foreign capital were given over two thirds of the country. The large-scale farms developed here produced for export only.

The Portuguese capitalists and the colonial settlers relied on the most primitive means of compelling labour and extracting a surplus—labour virtually without pay. This prevented them from developing a local market and a national economy in Mozambique, despite some feeble attempts after the 1930s.

Parasitism

Instead, during the capitalist boom following the Second World War, the Portuguese monopolies themselves came to share in this parasitic extraction. Most of all, Mozambique became a transit station and labour reservoir for the development of capitalism in South Africa. 90% of the traffic through its port and railway system (financed by British capital) was goods for South Africa and Rhodesia, not for Mozambique.

The 1909 Mozambique Convention, regularly renewed afterwards, guaranteed a supply of chained labour for the South African mining monopolies and landowners. The whole of southern Mozambique became a labour reservoir. The majority of adult men spent most of their working lives in South Africa. In 1974, there were 118 000 Mozambicans on the mines alone.

In return, the Convention provided that 47,5% of the Witwatersrand's imports would pass through the port of Lourenco Marques. Thus the colonial dictatorship financed its police apparatus with the revenues from transit tariffs and the sale of forced labour.

South Africa has become the biggest exporter to Mozambique, since the 1960s providing a bigger share of her imports than Portugal. The giant Cabora Bassa hydro-electric scheme links the two economies even more inextricably together. Mozambique relies on South Africa's ESCOM to rechannel electricity generated at Cabora Bassa, while ESCOM pays $1,3 million a week (only a fraction of the world market price) for its supplies from the scheme.

The parasitism of monopoly capitalism, based on violent labour exploitation and dispossession, held back to the extreme the development of a local market. Small settler farmers limited production to the needs of the tiny urban middle class. The indigenous peasantry were offered such low prices for their produce as to effectively remove them from the commodity market, leaving them to stagnate in tribal backwardness.

Thus 'modern civilisation' was summed up in the intolerably wretched prostration of the overwhelming majority of the oppressed Mozambicans.

The rapacious greed of landlordism and capitalism, their deathbearing process of absolute force and division, created the surging flame of mass struggle to challenge colonial dictatorship.

The new challenge burst forth after the Second World War in the form of strikes among the small Mozambican working class. In 1947, 1948 and again in 1956, the workers in the docks and plantations launched fearless strikes, which were mercilessly crushed by massacre, imprisonment and deportations.

Thus the Mozambican working class began to open up a chasm in the foundations of the Portuguese dictatorship. It was a struggle against the bankruptcy of monopoly capitalism shared with the masses throughout Africa as well as Latin America and Asia. In the absence of a triumphant socialist revolution in the advanced capitalist countries of Europe and the US, the masses of the colonial world were forced to take on their own shoulders alone the offensive against the cracking fortress of imperialism.

Unlike the big imperialist powers, the weak Portuguese ruling class could not afford timely reform or retreat. For them a neo-colonial domination of Mozambique was ruled out. Any step backward would have become a rout.

Combative

For these reasons the small Mozambican intellectual elite, in their opposition to the colonial regime, found the door barred to achieving independence by constitutional means. Frelimo, founded by militants among them on 25 June 1962, was drawn magnetically to the combativeness of the working class.

The workers' movement, despite the absence of trade unions, had prepared single-handedly the foundation of relentless struggle against Portuguese colonial overlordship and the grip of monopoly-finance capital. Also, since its grievances were not merely regional or tribal, the struggles of the working class against exploitation and oppression laid a basis of national identity.

At the same time Frelimo established contact with the peasant movement in the north, which was inspired by the workers' struggle. Peasant demonstrations against forced labour were brutally crushed at Mueda in 1960, when 600 were massacred by the Portuguese colonial police.

In 1963 Frelimo led the most highly coordinated and organised series of strikes yet achieved by the working class, in Lourenco Marques, Beira and Nacala. But, with the defeat of these strikes, the Frelimo leadership turned wholly to the peasant movement.

Given the weakness of the forces of genuine Marxism on a world scale in this period, the Mozambican working class lacked an independent political organisation and leadership.

Themselves lacking a Marxist perspective, the Frelimo leaders came to the conclusion that the workers' movement could not lead the struggle for national liberation against the vicious Portuguese dictatorship. Thus the strategic task of organising the workers on the docks, mines and plantations—and of linking them systematically both with the rural masses and, through the channels of migrant labour, with the workers of South Africa—was not undertaken.

Instead, in 1964, Frelimo turned exclusively to guerilla warfare which, from the point of view of Marxism, even in a country with an overwhelmingly rural population, should never be more than an important auxiliary to the workers' movement.

Most of the surviving and ablest fighters of the working class— including Samora Machel, a hospital porter—left the workers' movement and soon underwent guerilla training. Thus the towns, the plantations and the ports were abandoned for a decade to the control of the foreign overlords and monopoly-finance companies.

Turning for assistance to Stalinist China, the Frelimo leadership came to model their struggle on the peasant war which had taken place in China in the 1930s and 1940s, led by Mao Tse-Tung's Red Army. (In China, as in Mozambique, this peasant struggle under the leadership of the middle class developed in the wake of a defeat of the working class in the revolutionary uprisings of 1925-27.)

Without any possibility of waiting upon the European or American working class to overthrow their own imperialist ruling classes, Frelimo fighters stood at the head of the struggling masses with selfless sacrifice in the period of capitalism's greatest boom from 1964 to 1974.

Over these years the enormous and futile waste of resources by the feeble Portuguese ruling class on the colonial wars in Angola, Mozambique and Guine-Bissau led to a rotting of its strength. In 1974 revolution in Portugal, sparked off by a military coup, overthrew the Caetano dictatorship.

With capitalist rule in Portugal near to collapse under the pressure of the masses, the colonial state machinery disintegrated. In Mozambique, Frelimo inherited control.

The tasks thrust upon the Frelimo leadership were Himalayan in their vastness. Four hundred years of vile Portuguese colonialist savagery, and nearly a century of plunder by monopoly capitalism, had built no national economy at all.

Ninety per cent of the people were illiterate and the overwhelming majority excluded from the market. Less than 10% of the land was under cultivation. The overwhelming part of cash-crop agriculture was based on forced labour and insignificantly mechanised. Industry was tiny.

With independence looming, the Portuguese settler-exploiters took to flight. By 1975, 250 000 had been reduced to 20 000. The 7 000 Portuguese running cash-crop agriculture were all gone. Together, these represented the sum total of landlordism-capitalism and of centuries-old Portuguese rule—the administration of the state, hospitals, education, agriculture and industry.

It was no part of Frelimo's conscious programme to carry through the overthrow of capitalism as the outcome of the defeat of Portuguese colonialism. But, as in China, Cuba and Vietnam, the disintegration of the old state and the capitalist class in Mozambique, and the surging movement of the masses, thrust Frelimo in the direction of nationalising production, and enabled it to build a new state machine on the basis of the guerilla army.

(Whereas in Zimbabwe, ZANU—with a similar programme and method of struggle—ended up compromising with capitalism because of the relative strength of the capitalist class and the continued cohesion of the old state apparatus.)

Inheritance

On this new basis, Frelimo inherited the tasks which capitalism did not, and could not, carry through in Mozambique.

The bourgeois revolutions in Europe in the early nineteenth century had meant a massive expansion of the economic surplus based on the growth of industry. This in turn had rested on a revolution in agriculture, releasing labour from the land and providing food for the new urban population. In turn, the development of industry had cheapened the supply of goods to the rural people

Mozambique, however, now faced not the early nineteenth but the late twentieth century, with capitalism in decay world-wide. Frelimo's accession to power coincided with a simultaneous recession in all the major capitalist countries, signalling the end of the post-war boom period and the onset of a period of generalised capitalist crisis. If the massive industry in the major Western countries had already become trapped in the contradictions of capitalism, what scope could there be for the development of industry on a capitalist basis in poverty-stricken Mozambique, with a population of only ten million?

In fact, with the flight of the capitalists, the workers took over control in the factories and did their best to restabilise production.

Sweeping nationalisations followed, representing an immense step forward, and opening the way, on the basis of economic planning, to begin to create a modern economy and lay the basis of industry. But in this epoch, especially given the extreme under-development of Mozambique, even these measures cannot overcome the problems of society.

With the victory of the liberation struggle and the flight of the settler-exploiters, the plantations were abandoned. Freed from forced labour, rural workers and peasants concentrated on subsistence agriculture or moved to the towns. Maputo's population mushroomed from 500 000 to 1 200 000 by the beginning of 1978.

Frelimo developed an economic plan of 'communalisation' of peasant agriculture in the effort to create a surplus of food for the towns. Following Tanzania's attempt at 'self-reliance', Frelimo stated that production based on creating communal villages would develop agriculture as the "spine of production and progress", with industry as the "secondary dynamo".

But the expenditure required to construct whole communal villages and produce an agricultural surplus—while also developing free medical care and education, and investing in industry—was far beyond the immediate capacities of the Mozambican economy.

The mass of the peasantry can only be persuaded to produce a surplus if in turn it can be provided with the goods it needs—implements, fertilisers and other manufactured commodities. Thus the development of peasant agriculture depends on the development of industry. But the development of industry depends on the import of machinery and other capital goods. These in turn must be paid for out of exports, which must earn the necessary foreign exchange. But exports are only possible if a surplus is produced in agriculture.

This is the vicious circle of underdevelopment in which Frelimo finds itself.

The obstacles to the strategy of 'communalisation' turned the Frelimo leadership onto a different course. A new emphasis was laid on the development of state agriculture (mainly on the old plantations) to provide food and cash crops, and also on the development of industry. The overwhelming majority of the peasantry would have to remain reliant on subsistence agriculture.

The huge dislocations of the independence period, followed by the devastation wreaked by Smith's Rhodesian forces and immense natural disasters (droughts and floods) meant a colossal fall at first in agricultural and industrial production below pre-independence levels.

But, slowly, the inherent advantage of the planned economy over capitalism today has asserted itself. Agricultural and industrial production, from the depths of 1976-78, has begun to pick up—though the targets of the 1977 plan for restoration of pre-independence levels by 1980 have on the whole not been met.

The shortage of foreign exchange remains chronic. After the revolution, tourism fell to nothing, and with the drastic reduction in the number of migrant workers to South Africa, remittances from that source have fallen steeply. South African cargo through Maputo remains a main source of foreign exchange revenue—providing a stick in the hand of the South African ruling class. At the same time much of Mozambique's foreign exchange has to be spent on defending the country—precisely against the South African threat!

Where 90% of the population is illiterate, the social importance of being literate immediately makes itself felt. After independence, those privileged to have received an education under the Portuguese, the majority of whom did not participate in the sacrifices of the revolution, stepped into the bureaus and organisations of the state.

The peasants' and workers' committees, which had sprung up in the period of transition (1974-75) as an expression of the enthusiasm and initiative of the masses, could not exercise control over the flood of careerists and opportunists into the new state bureaucracy.

In consequence, dozens of state organisations became labyrinths of inertia, making even simple tasks impossible.

development, Frelimo proclaimed itself the "vanguard party of the Mozambican workers and peasants". But this has nothing in common with the idea of a revolutionary party developed by Lenin, as an instrument in the struggle for workers' democracy.

In fact the workers and peasants have never directly held power in Mozambique, and, within the framework of Mozambique alone there is no material basis for a regime of workers' democracy—in which the producers themselves control and manage all aspects of the economy and society.

Economic under-development submerges the toilers in illiteracy and preoccupies them with a desperate struggle for survival day to day. It deprives them of the possibility of taking in their own hands the general management of

...the inherent advantage of the planned economy is beginning to assert itself

The statements of the Frelimo leadership itself point to the extent of the problems. GODCA (the organising centre for communal agriculture) has been criticised as "completely lacking in dynamism and ... excessively bureaucratic in its methods".

At a major Maputo flour mill the Industry and Energy Minister found "a total lack of respect for safety norms, warehouses in a chaotic state and a generally run-down appearance".

The Minister of Finance found that the important Chimoio railway line had become a bottleneck in the country's distribution system, with perishable foods left to rot.

At one state farm, Marcelino dos Santos discovered that only 50% of tractors were in working condition.

At a rally in March 1980 Samora Machel stated: "We found organised red tape, bureaucracy transformed into a system to paralyse the economy—our state apparatus is corrupted".

This state of affairs threatens not only the progress of the economy but also, if continued unchecked, Frelimo's own monopoly of state power.

As early as 1977, to combat this the economy and the state. Thus the educated layer of society develops for itself a monopoly of these functions. At the same time generalised poverty and a low level of production makes it impossible to satisfy the pressing needs of everybody, and impels the ruling elite towards establishing authoritarian control over the masses.

Mozamblque is nevertheless, in the last analysis, a workers' state, despite power being in the grasp of an elite petty-bourgeois stratum. It is a workers' state because this stratum rules on the basis of an economic system characterised by state ownership and planning—which is the foundation of a workers' state.

However, without workers' democracy, the workers state is inevitably deformed in the direction of bureaucracy, inequality, elitism, privilege, corruption and eventually outright police dictatorship over the masses. That process is historically unavoidable in Mozambique while the revolution is isolated in conditions of mass poverty, illiteracy and under-development.

Behind the proclamation of itself as a "vanguard party", Frelimo has in reality declared itself the keystone in the formation of the new state bureaucracy. All the organs of the state have become centralised around the "party". The workers' and peasants' committees have become effectively subordinated to the leading bodies of party and state.

Thus the inefficiency of rampant bureaucracy in the first period, which Frelimo has been obliged to combat with the support of the masses, is being overcome by consolidating ... a more efficient bureaucracy. That is the inevitability within the confines of Mozambique alone, and it is not altered by the undoubted fact that especially the lower ranks of Frelimo are still infused with idealism, self-sacrifice, hard work in the interests of developing the country, and sincere commitment to uplift the conditions of the workers and peasants.

For a whole period ahead (depending on international developments, particularly in South Africa), the Frelimo apparatus will play a relatively progressive role in the development of the Mozambican economy, and will be able to retain the support of the majority of the people.

But even within the next few years, the bureaucratic character of Frelimo will become much more apparent. Precisely to the extent that the state succeeds in reorganising production, consolidating its control and procuring a steady economic surplus—opportunities for growing inequality, official privilege, disparities of income, status, etc, will become irresistible to the bureaucracy.

At the same time, locked into the problems of backwardness, defending its basis of nationalised production and planning, trying to combat wastage and the pressures of the market, trying to increase production and meet the needs of the masses, the Frelimo bureaucracy will be forced into one zig-zag of policy after another. Already these zig-zags are evident, and frequent.

In 1979-80 emphasis in the factories was placed on the sole powers of managers to "decide ... organise, lead and control production". The need for special rewards and privileges for those with responsible posts was stressed. Now, in 1981, there has been a call for managers not to close themselves off in their offices, and instead to develop a "collective socialist method of organising"!

Disbanded workers' committees have been reactivated to 'participate' in management. An earlier decree that no worker was to be allowed into the office of a manager without an appointment has been withdrawn.

Zig-zags

Similar zig-zags have characterised the area of distribution. Chronic shortages have meant, as the official Mozambican Information Agency has reported, that queuing has become a way of life. While rationing of goods under police control at least ensured for the poor their access to basic supplies, corruption of officials inevitably set in and a flourishing 'black market' sprang up.

Thus Frelimo was obliged to retreat partially and allow private trade to develop legally again, although state consumer cooperatives continue to be encouraged. If the traders later become a threat to Frelimo's power, we will again see a sharp swing, including severe police measures, against them.

Despite the overwhelming and chronic problems of the economy, Frelimo at its 1980 conference launched an economic plan promising, within ten years, abundant food, adequate housing and clothing, an end to unemployment and illiteracy, "developed agriculture!", and a gigantic development of heavy and light industry.

But within the framework of Mozambique alone, this economic projection is utopian—it cannot be achieved.

Moving the adoption of the plan, Samora Machel promised that within ten years "Mozambique will be well on its way to advanced socialism". But a transition of society to socialism, once capitalism has been overthrown, is only possible under a regime of workers' democracy. If the perspective is confined within Mozambique alone, economic backwardness guarantees bureaucratism, and the development of bureaucracy bars the way to workers' democracy.

Carrying its huge weight of inherited poverty, with a market of only ten million, with the regional economy under the domination of South African monopoly capitalism, the Mozambican economy on its own can develop only at a snail's pace.

Low productivity levels, which will be all that is possible for an extended period, will create a constant temptation to import cheaper goods. Certainly, to obtain capital goods, there is no escape from the world market. Even China and the Soviet Union, with their huge internal markets and long period of development on the basis of nationalised production and planning, have not been able to escape from the world market.

Participation in the world market unavoidably means subordinating production of immediate consumer needs to the requirements of production for export, in order to secure foreign exchange. It means securing loans—and then paying back interest at crippling rates. It means, as the plan recognised, an open investment call to monopoly capitalism, although this is to be controlled so as not to threaten the grip of the state on the economy as a whole.

At the same time the crisis in the world capitalist economy means a stagnating world market, uncertain sales and prices for raw material exports, and continued inflation of prices of imported goods.

Nor is there a way out through COMECON and aid from the Stalinist states of Russia, Eastern Europe and China. Though much new investment in Mozambican industry is from these areas, there are limits set on it by the growing stagnation of the Eastern European economies and the Soviet Union.

Frelimo places great hopes on regional integration under the banner of SADCC (Southern African Development and Coordination Conference) to combat the domination of SA capitalism and create a larger trade zone centred around the ports of Mozambique.

The formation of SADCC, since Zimbabwean independence, signifies a partial weakening of the grip of the South African ruling class. It potentially disrupts the SA strategy of a constellation of Southern African states tied to the SA commodity market, banks and industry.

But of the nine African states involved most are in the grip of landlordism-capitalism and face inevitable social upheavals in the coming decade. None have the prospect of the necessary huge investments in the plans for electrifying and industrialising Southern Africa.

This is because the entire SADCC endeavour cannot escape the grip of international monopoly capital, which merely-hopes through SADCC to increase its own markets. The main vultures are the ailing Scandinavian capitalists.

Realistically, SADCC is a serious but unfortunately doomed effort to free Southern Africa from the grip of monopoly capitalism.

Meanwhile the SA ruling class, its back to the wall at home and abroad, stands inevitably in conflict with the planned economy of Mozambique. Seeking to trap the Mozambican bureaucracy in its clutches, it will at the same time take every opportunity of exploiting the weaknesses of the Mozambican economy.

Machel: "organised red tape" paralysing the economy

The development of two counterrevolutionary guerilla organisations—the Movimento Nacional de Resistancia (MRM) and the Freedom of Africa Organisation (FAO)—armed and financed by the SA ruling class—has been possible only because of the extreme underdevelopment of Mozambique. The fact that these organisations have been able to establish a foothold in areas of Mozambique which previously sustained Frelimo throughout the war of liberation, shows that the peasantry has not yet received the material advantages from the revolution that would have roused them to mass resistance against the invaders.

No reversal

Therefore the poverty of the peasantry turns it into a potential tool in the hands of SA imperialism, and emphasises the vital importance of the South African revolution for the future of Mozambique.

The present counter-revolutionary intrusion can remain an irritant. But neither this, nor the concessions to small businessmen and shopkeepers, nor relations with the world market, can reverse the gains of the Mozambican revolution. It would now probably take a full-scale SA invasion to restore capitalism in Mozambique, and even that would be most unlikely to succeed.

Leaning on the support of the workers and peasantry, the Frelimo bureaucracy will defend the basis of nationalised production and economic planning on which its own interests rest.

Yet the inch-by-inch development possible within the framework of Mozambique alone will not be overcome short of the triumph of the Southern African workers' revolution, centred on South Africa itself.

For the people of Mozambique, for the rank and file of Frelimo, that is the way out of economic isolation, poverty, bureaucratic deformation and the unending expenditure of precious resources on military defence against SA capitalist aggression. The way forward is to link up with the working class of South Africa in the struggle to carry through to completion the Southern African revolution.

Inevitably, however, the limited perspective and narrow national self-interest of the Mozambican bureaucracy prevent it from aiding this development and linking its future to the workers' revolution in South Africa. Indeed, the more it consolidates its power and develops its privileges as a ruling elite, the more consciously it will become a barrier to a united struggle of the Southern African working class.

Nevertheless, despite obstacles from the leadership, this is the true course of workers' internationalism which Marxists in Frelimo need to set before them.

With the destruction of the reactionary powerhouse of SA capitalism through a struggle linked up throughout Southern Africa under the leadership of a united working class, and with the establishment of workers' democracy in South Africa and throughout the region, the way will lie open to rapid industrialisation and to mechanisation of agriculture within Mozambique. Here lies the road to the fulfillment of the goals of the Frelimo ten-year plan.

The fulfillment of this programme rests firmly on the shoulders of the Mozambican and South African working class. They are the foundation of a future Socialist Southern Africa, joining in the wider struggle for a socialist world.

Which way forward Namibia?

By Jake Wilson

South Africa's bloody sweep through southern Angola shows in its bare-faced aggression that the interests of the capitalists can only be secured through violence and terror against the people of Southern Africa.

It also raises the question sharply of whether South Africa is heading towards an uncontrolled plunge into war against those countries struggling to escape the iron grip of the South African ruling class. Angola and Mozambique, which have overthrown landlordism and capitalism, are being marked out as special targets.

With an estimated 1 400 killed, with the roads, bridges, hospitals and homes of southern Angola smashed and some 14 000 refugees made homeless—more bloodsoaked chapters are being written into the records of capitalism in Southern Africa.

But as Marxism has explained, war is not the result of the blind operations of the military. It is pursued for definite political and class goals.

In a clear confirmation of this, the invasion of Angola has been followed within days by an announcement that South Africa is seeking, with American imperialism, a 'settlement' in Namibia within the framework of UN Security Council Resolution 435.

This new 'initiative' follows only months after the breakdown of the Geneva talks, and Pretoria's arrogant assertion of its readiness to maintain the military occupation of Namibia indefinitely.

Clearly there is no prospect of the outright military defeat of the SA forces in Namibia, except after years of escalation of the fighting to the point where all Southern Africa becomes embroiled in war.

That perspective, with the likely involvement eventually of other military powers, is one which the imperialists are most anxious to avoid, and which the Botha regime also recognises to be against its own interests.

Botha's cabinet has undoubtedly come to the conclusion that an indefinite war will involve mounting dangers for the ruling class in South Africa itself. Not only is the cost in rands and lives mounting up—the war is having a radicalising effect in the townships, factories and mines which will become all the more serious as the mass struggle in South Africa grows.

Both the unparalleled aggression and the publicity given to South Africa's sudden acceptance of Resolution 435 have been the result of numerous public and secret meetings between the Botha regime and the representatives of American imperialism.

These talks have prepared the basis for a 'settlement' on terms acceptable to both, but which cannot meet the democratic or social demands of the Namibian working people.

Internationally, the South African regime has the best conditions for a favourable 'settlement' which it could hope for: out-andout reactionary regimes in both Washington and London on the one hand, and a Russian bureaucracy eager to resume 'detente' with the West on the other.

Within the region, poverty, economic chaos, and the effects of the world-wide capitalist recession are weakening the willingness of the governments of the 'Front Line' states to support a continuation and stepping up the guerilla war, with all its devastating consequences. The ruling strata in these countries are looking more and more narrowly to their own 'national self-interest', and are less concerned with the common interest of the workers and peasants to be liberated from the domination of imperialism.

Capitalist governments in Africa to the north scarcely disguise their eagerness for a neo-colonial 'settlement' of the Namibian struggle, on terms acceptable to South Africa. The Nigerian government initially even hesitated to condemn the SA invasion of Angola!

Despite this, the SA ruling class knows full well that SWAPO would win the elections. What they are desperately hoping is that a 'settlement' can take place on the lines of Zimbabwe. There the maintenance of white privilege and property were entrenched by agreement before any elections, and the guerillas were ultimately disarmed and some integrated into the old Rhodesian army.

The 'war programme' of nationalisation and land to the people was abandoned by the leadership.

In the case of Namibia the question of the army and police is likewise fundamental to the forth-coming negotiations. In the final analysis the state is armed bodies of men, prisons, etc. If the existing 'state' can be secured in advance of elections, as a means of defending the capitalists' property and social power in Namibia, then South Africa would reluctantly accept a SWAPO victory at the polls.

In any event Botha and the imperialists will try to hamstring a SWAPO government through devices like coalition with other parties, special constitutional privileges and guarantees for property-owners (in the guise of 'protecting minorities'), etc.

But even then, South Africa's rulers face huge problems. The masses will undoubtedly see the withdrawal of the SA army as a victory for the SWAPO guerillas and themselves.

The critical time will be the election period. Elections themselves will create enormous enthusiasm for SWAPO and big expectations on the part of the working people that a radical transformation of society will be carried out.

However, recently there has been a series of statements from Nujoma going against the earlier programme of SWAPO. For example, he has promised that "no white property will be touched." This is unfortunately intended to reassure the imperialists that the SWAPO leadership would be open to a 'Zimbabwe' outcome to negotiations.

At the negotiating table there will be further huge pressure on the SWAPO leadership to 'settle' on terms favourable to the capitalist class. This pressure will come not only from the Western powers and South Africa, but also from the 'Front Line' states. In the interests of 'detente' the Russian bureaucracy will undoubtedly add its weight.

There may well be stepped up aggression by the SA armed forces to increase the pressures up to the last minute of 'settlement', as in the case of Zimbabwe. Such attacks and other 'breakdowns in the negotiations' may disrupt and delay the process temporarily, but the general direction of events is now clear.

An important aspect of the strategy of SA imperialism and its allies was emphasised in Ingaba No.

2: "Their immediate aim is to destroy SWAPO as a military force that could form the basis of an alternative state machine. At the same time they are trying to strengthen the basis of their own state power in Namibia." Thus they hope to avert the danger of a future SWAPO government taking over the property of the capitalists, and going the way of Angola and Mozambique.

This strategy is now being carried out by the SA armed forces, and a 'South West African Defence Force' made up of mainly black conscripts is being hastily constructed.

Fatal weakness

But the weakness of the puppets in Windhoek (who are already rejected by the masses), the inexperience and lack of cohesion of the new army, and the wild racism of the local whites, are creating a nightmare for the ruling class strategists. The whole structure of government painstakingly put together by Botha and the imperialists, threatens to collapse if South African troops were to be withdrawn.

It is this potentially fatal weakness which has led to the desperate measures of massacre both in Namibia and southern Angola. Every attempt is being made to break SWAPO as a military force and to smash its lines of supply.

Drawn for Inqaba by Alan Hardman, cartoonist of the Militant (weekly paper of the Marxist tendency in the British Labour Party).

The short-term 'incursion' has no timetable for departure; this will now be dependent on the forthcoming negotiations. Every effort is being made to strengthen Savimbi's UNITA in southern Angola—both as a form of imperialist pressure on the MPLA government, and as a buffer against SWAPO guerillas.

Namibian 'state'

The Botha regime, and its imperialist backers, are trying to avert the danger of a post-independence state in Namibia based on SWAPO's own military forces. Hence the creation of the 'SWA Defence Force'. With this foundation of the Namibian 'state' secured (so they calculate), SA troops could eventually be withdrawn.

Significantly, these aims of imperialism against the democratic rights and genuine self-determination of the Namibian people, are not at all incompatible with Resolution 435 as it is being interpreted by the powers, and as the 'Front Line' states have been brought to accept.

In terms of 435, the SWAPO guerillas will be forced to withdraw from Namibia itself; the UN troops who are to be brought in will not completely replace the South African army; and the South African Administrator General (who commands the police and SWA Defence Force) will stay on and work with the UN Special Representative who will organise the elections.

As planned, the UN force will be overwhelmingly made up of troops from the imperialist powers and their allies.

The workers in Namibia and South Africa can have a vital role in weakening the Botha regime and in toppling the plans of imperialism to maintain a neo-colonial grip on Namibia.

Even now the workers' organisations, open and underground, should be preparing action to support the social and political demands of the Namibian working people: an end to the passes, a living wage, South African troops out, nationalisation of the mines and big business, the land to those who work it, etc. To mobilise and fight for such a programme is the urgent responsibility of the SWAPO leadership, and of every SWAPO activist.

The solution to the poverty of the masses and the devastation of the rural areas depends on overthrowing the capitalist class and its state, so that a planned economy can be organised under the control of the working people.

In conjunction with the action of guerillas in the countryside, the ground can be prepared for a general strike, and the arming of the workers initially for self-defence, particularly in the compounds.

In this direction, with the armed workers organised around a programme for the complete destruction of capitalist power and the creation of a democratic workers' state, the road would lie open to genuine self-determination for the people of Namibia.

But such a struggle could not be successful if confined to Namibia alone. Botha's armed forced will be defeated only in common struggle with the powerful black working class of South Africa, whose aid is also needed to secure workers' power in Namibia.

The real task for the leaders of SWAPO and the ANC together, and for every activist in struggle throughout Southern Africa, is to build up the links and put forward the policies, strategy and tactics by which mass unity in action will be achieved.

As we concluded in Inqaba No. 2: "Such a victory against the South African army of occupation would also advance by leaps and bounds the South African revolution itself. On this road lies the solution to all the needs of the Namibian people, and those of Southern Africa as a whole."

"The workers in Namibia and South Africa can have a vital role in... toppling the plans of imperialism to maintain a neocolonial grip on Namibia."

The Struggle for the Land

By Florence Bosch and Themba Sikhakhane

For the toiling people in South Africa, the question of who owns and controls the land is completely bound up with who owns the factories, mines, farms and other workplaces, and with who controls the state which protects the ownership of these things.

Black people in South Atrica are effectively denied the right to own land in their own country. Certainly, the ruling class has 'generously' allowed 13% of the most barren parts for occupation by Africans and a tiny amount in the urban areas for Coloured and Indian "Group Areas". But removals and evictions show that even in these "reserved areas" the will of the state holds sway.

No black person has a right to live anywhere in South Africa—let alone own outright a patch of soil. There is no other country in the world where a minority in society denies the right to land to a majority on the basis of colour. The reason for this must be found in the way South African capitalism developed.

Servitude

When the Dutch (and later British) colonialists invaded the shores of South Africa, they were confronted with well-organised indigenous tribes holding land communally and producing largely for subsistence. To 'open up' South Africa for capitalist domination, the colonial rulers were confronted with two needs—to conquer the tribes and seize their land, and to transform the tribesmen into wage labourers.

This proved no easy task, as the bloody wars of resistance testify.

Lacking the power to remove the indigenous tribes from their land altogether, the capitalists drove them into the reserves, 'freeing' their land for exploitation by white farmers. Those that could not be pushed out were reduced to servitude on their ancestral land, now controlled by the brutal white landowning class.

Through the imposition of cash taxes, combined with the relentless pressures of overcrowding and poverty, the capitalists then drove the tribesmen from the reserves in search of employment and used the instruments of the pass laws and influx control to control them.

That arch-villain Cecil Rhodes summed up this process in 1894 when he spoke of "the gentle stimulant of the labour tax to remove them (ie Africans) from a life of sloth and laziness; you will teach them the dignity of labour."

In this way the capitalist class could secure for itself the supply of cheap labour necessary for development.

Late development

At the time capitalism dug its roots in South Africa, it already existed as a world system and was entering its highest, convulsive stage of wars and revolutions—the epoch of imperialism.

Monopoly capitalism had already carved up the world market on the basis of large scale production. This enabled the monopolies to undercut smaller producers by lowering prices.

So, to accumulate wealth, the South African capitalists, interlocked as junior partners with world capitalism, were compelled to produce, sell and buy commodities at prices laid down on the world markets. The possibilities for development have been shaped within these limits.

The capitalists have been able to compete profitably in agriculture, industry and mining only by maintaining in existence a constant supply of cheap labour through the migrant labour system.

The transformation of indigenous tribesmen into cheap wage-labourers migrating between the reserves and the workplaces, always under the strong arm of the law, made possible South Africa's economic development. The whole edifice of apartheid which arose—racial division, passes, and the police state—ensures that this cheap labour system continues.

By placing barriers on the right of black people to own land, the SA ruling class not only got the land and cheap labour, but they also made sure that no black farming class could arise to compete with them for profits. The 1913 Land Act, for example, was passed for this purpose.

Capitalism in South Africa did not develop in the gradual manner it did in Britain and other advanced countries. Its development was rapid and convulsive. The conquered tribesman found himself thrown directly into wage labour; the very same class that stole his land confronted him as slavedriver on the factory floor and down the mine.

Thus it became imprinted on the consciousness of the migrant worker that the questions of land deprivation, national oppression, the pass laws and cheap labour are all inseparably bound up together.

All this explains why the relation between the workers and their bosses appears at the same time as a relation between the conquered and their conqueror. The black working class has been shaped in production not just as a class, but as part of a nation struggling for liberation.

The struggles that developed against land seizure, cash taxes, "rehabilitation" schemes and all the measures intended to force out the Africans into selling their labour power to the capitalists, bore the imprint of a struggle between a working-class-in-the-making and imperialism. The Bambata rebellion, for example, often cited as the last stand of tribal society, was in reality the struggle of land-workers and a disappearing peasantry against the poll tax impositions of the vicious colonial state.

The struggles against cattleculling in the late 1940's, for example in Witzieshoek, and those that followed against Bantu Authorities and the Rehabilitation Schemes, were battles of migrant workers and their families against a continued onslaught intended to reduce them to pauperism.

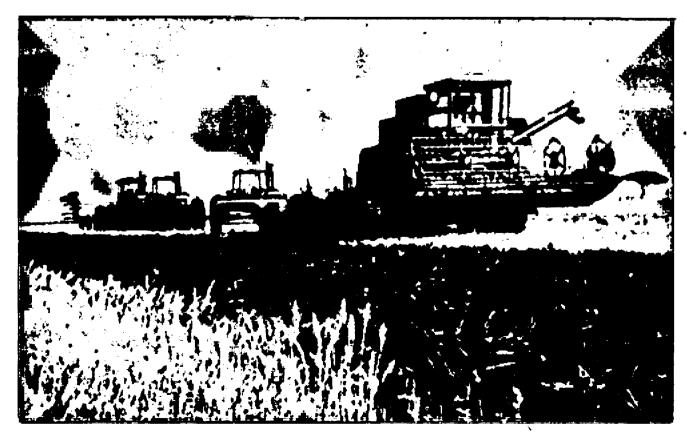

In the reserves, the masses have increasingly lost their real link with the land. People struggle in vain for mealies from their tiny plots and milk from barren grazing lands. Millions are completely landless. Even when confined to the countryside, all these are forever dependent on wages for survival.

To the oppressed workers, the reconquest of the land is an essential part of their struggle against oppression and exploitation. The land was seized from them to reduce them to wage labourers; it is used as an instrument against them to perpetuate their servitude.

The land and the pass are knotted together. The pass brands the migrant as a landless proletarian, destined to move between the reserves and the urban areas at the whim of the bosses.

The barriers on free movement are bound up with the barriers to the land. The same class that denies blacks the right to the land, at the same time forces Africans to live on it in the reserves.

That is why the questions of the . Large-scale capitalist production predominates on the land land, the pass laws, poverty and democracy are all seen as one and the same. They all go back to one thing—capitalism. Who owns the land has a central part in determining who rules society.

Reconquering the land

The solution to the problem of who should own the land poses itself differently for the workers than for the middle-class elements. Sections of the black middle class see the solution to the land question as the redivision of the land so that they might own land and get rich. They want barriers to land ownership lifted, the white farmers pushed off, and the land granted to themselves.

But the working class always solves its problems in its own way. For the working class, the owners of land are not simply whites, but capitalists who use their ownership of the land as a lever to take all that the workers produce. To destroy the power of the capitalists requires seizing from them what they have stolen and using it for the good of the people.

Redivision of the large capitalist farms would not solve the problems facing the working class and its families; it would mean a reduction in food production and the replacement of one group of capitalists by another.

Reconquest of the land can only mean the complete taking over of the country—the land, the factories mines and banks—by a workers' government based on the majority of the people, with the expropriation not only of the white capitalist farmers, but the industrialists and financiers too.

Only when the land has been reconquered in this manner will the power of the whites over the black people—and with it the power of the bosses over the workers—be broken.

Why should it be the workers, who own nothing but their ability to labour, who hold the solution to the land question?

Because it was the capitalist class who completed the process of stealing the land from the people and

Mass removals and starvation are part and parcel of capitalism who hold it today. The South African bourgeoisie has carried through its revolution on the land, ensuring that large-scale capitalist production predominates everywhere.

The bywoners have long been eliminated. Every year sees more small white farmers gobbled up by big business on the land. Today about 80% of the maize is produced on 10% of the farms.

The peculiar, distorted and very rapid development of capitalism in South Africa meant that tribesmen were transformed directly into proletarians. A stable peasantry has never existed in South Africa for this reason. The rural poor of the reserves are none other than the families of the migrant workers.

This explains the special significance of the land question for the working class, whose historic role it will be to liberate the land for the people, and the people from the land.

How will the question of who owns and controls the land then be resolved? Only in the course of determined struggle, of industrial and agricultural workers united. The land question will not be solved by the passing of laws, but by the forcible seizure of the land.

This will require the organisation of the workers on every farm in the country, and their linking up with the workers' organisations in the industrial areas.

The same organs of democratic workers' power used to take the land in the course of the revolution can then be used to re-organise production.

At a national level, the revolutionary overthrow of the present regime and its substitution by a democratic workers' state will lay the basis for the planning of all social production to meet the needs of the people. The priority as far as the land is concerned will be to ensure sufficient for every man, woman and child to eat, both in the towns and on the land.

This will require nationalisation of the large farms and estates and the organisation of production on them under workers' control.

At the same time areas of unused farmland would have to be taken over and turned to productive use, with collective farming encouraged and assisted. Only in this way will efficient, large-scale production with tractors, harvestors, etc., be possible.

The revolution on the land will not only have to provide food for the towns, but also lift from misery and brutal degradation the agricultural workers who have long produced the food of South Africa and got so little in return. The overthrow of capitalism would make possible for the first time a decent standard of living for workers on the land.

Furthermore, the reserves as reservoirs of cheap labour must go, together with the pass laws. People will then be able to move freely from village and farm to town.

Hundreds of thousands of people now in the reserves will flee from the barren life on a barren strip of soil to which influx control has condemned them for so long, to seek new opportunities in the towns. In this way, the revolution will liberate the people from the land.

What will happen to the land in the reserves and on the smaller white farms? This will have to be decided by committees of workers together with their families in the local areas. It would not undermine the power of a workers' state if some redistribution into private hands takes place, as long as the main food producing regions are in the hands of the state and controlled by the workers in the interests of all the people.

Whatever the case, huge resources will have to be pumped into the poorer areas to enrich the soil, and provide implements and irrigation. In this way voluntary collectivisation can be encouraged, with greater productivity in the production of food.

The Freedom Charter, programme of Congress, calls for the restoring of the land to the people. Every oppressed person agrees with that. But how is this restoration to be achieved, and what will it mean in practice?

To carry through this programme of reconquest of land by the people, there can be no compromise with the interests of the white landowning class. Unfortunately, the leaders of the ANC are not clear on this issue. Thus Sechaba, October 1980, states that "the capitalist farmers ... will have to be re-educated in the spirit of the Freedom Charter ... (as) is happening in Zimbabwe."

But the point to be made about Zimbabwe is that the land has not been restored to the people!

All the more is it the case in South Africa that the land can only be taken back by collective force, in the course of a revolutionary struggle against the capitalist class as a whole. And the land thus liberated must be put to the service of the entire people through the means of a workers' state nationally and organs of workers' power locally.

Because the peasantry has been eliminated in South Africa, the demand simply for the redistribution of the land as a whole into private hands would only undermine the unity of the revolution; who would become the new land-owners and who not? That is apart from the immediate crisis and chaos it would cause in the vital production of food for the towns.

The task in the next period is to build the links between the industrial and agricultural workers, to develop a united and invincible force that can sweep away capitalism from the face of SA.

That is the only way to solve the land question, along with all the questions of national, and social liberation.

The workers on every farm need to be organised and linked to the urban workers organisations

Dr Marino Chiavelli shows the kind of 'internationalism' practised by the capitalist class. Born in Italy, he has sucked his wealth from the labour of workers in Ghana, Zaire, the Middle East and who knows where else.

Now this drifting parasite has landed up in South Africa to set up his modest little retirement home in Hyde Park, Johannesburg. 'Doing up the place'—including a five-suite guest house, swimming pool, massage' bath, tennis court and sunken rose garden—will cost him R15 million. A few knick-knacks for decoration will add another R30 million—while a few miles away in Kliptown homeless people are eating out of dustbins.

But clearly Dr Chiavelli will not be employing black servants. Each of his 20 servants' rooms will have a fivestar bathroom.

"Sooner or later we will have to finish them off. The only difference now is that I am being paid to do it." This is the mentality of Johann Verster, formerly a Second Lieutenant in the Citizen Force Third Parachute Batallion with a medal for his role in the South African invasion of Angola.

Verster has been turning his military skills to exploiting the most devastating of the miseries of the black oppressed—land hunger. Crowded into the Bantustans by the regime, made desperate by mass starvation, some people are misled by the chiefs into fratricidal faction fighting.

Over the last four years in Kwazulu at least 827 men were killed in faction fights. Verster, enlisted by one of the factions, was receiving R800 a head per murder—if he produced the head. He had lost count of the people he had massacred.

So long as land hunger exists, so long as the SA military machine churns out trained racist killers, the Versters of this world will emerge like a creeping fungus.

Among recent investors in Namibia is Jean-Baptiste Doumeng, the notorious French 'red millionaire' who, by exploiting his position in the French CP, has made a fortune out of agricultural dealings between France and the Soviet Union.

In 1980 he signed a contract for the construction of a modern abbatoir at Gobabis, with the blessing of the SA government, as a basis for exporting meat from Namibia to France and other countries. We wonder what the Namibian, and French, workers will think of this new venture.

The march to Parliament by 1 000 Capetonians on 20 August (in protest at the mass removal of Nyanga residents) produced an interesting glimpse of the real nature of the so-called liberal opponents of the government—the PFP.

Their leading 'civil liberties' spokesman, Helen Suzman, was taken to task by the Nats. "Did you take part in the demonstration?" asked Horwood. "No, no, no, no!" she replied angrily. Not only did she not participate, she replied, but she tried to persuade the marchers not to go as they would be breaking at least two laws! In fact, she says, she helped to stop what could have been a "nasty incident".

The PFP and their big-business backers continue to demonstrate the extent of their 'opposition' to the vicious regime. While thousands of Nyanga residents were being made homeless, they want no more than to keep their petticoats clean and help the government avoid 'nasty incidents'.

Compare the yellowness of Suzman with the courageous defiance of the ANC fighters who, after being sentenced to death earlier in the week, raised their clenched fists and declared: "long live the toiling masses of South Africa, long live the spirit of international mankind!"

A FAT MAN'S VIEW ON THE BREAD PRICE

By Rocco Malgas

Following below is how we think Minister Lapa "R20" Munnik might have reacted to the increase in the price of bread:

The price of bread goes up a mere 33% to 40% and what do we get? Praise? No! Instead we have an outcry by faint-hearted liberals (whose side are they on?), consumer organisations, communists and other subversive elements who incite all those hardworking bread-eaters to discontent.

The thing, however, is to understand that man cannot live by bread alone so people need to diversify. Why can't they eat rice, potatoes, eggs or meat? Why be so particular about bread?

What do you mean we are being heartless? In this country people don't appreciate the special problems of government. In any case there was a very good reason to increase the price of bread. Like my colleague Minister Pen Kotze said: 'For years South Africans had cheap bread and wasted it, they still do so today and we cannot afford that.' Waste not, want not, I say.

If people waste bread when it is cheap, do you think they will do so when it is expensive—of course not! And this is what I like about the low increase in the bread subsidy announced in the latest budget. (To tell the truth I sometimes think it is much too big, the subsidy I mean.) I mean government has subsidised bread to the tune of R162 million per annum. That is a lot of money.

The call by subversives to increase the bread subsidy to avoid a price increase is therefore sheer madness. Because it will mean bread remains cheap and people continue to waste it

Many people don't understand that money used for subsiding bread etc. could be better used to defend our Republic against the total onslaught on our borders and within. Really this is what I don't like about only a 40% increase in defence expenditure proposed in the budget. Sometimes I ask myself if our Owen Horwood isn't still mixed up with his old liberal cocktail friends.

What do you mean all the arms in the world can't stop a revolution? The Shah of Iran? Nee kêrel! If we had our own Brigadier Swanepoel over there together with some of our young men from Info to explain the total onslaught to those people there could never have been a revolution, much less talk about it.

What do you mean thousands of people starving and revolution crawling on its belly? You should know that the truth is that the National Party has done its duty to uplift the poor people of this country, especially the Bantu. There is no starvation in this land. People starving in Msinga—what rubbish! You musn't believe everything you read in the English press.

Anyway I don't see why people especially blacks, should complain about higher prices because black wages have actually increased on average by 6% in the past year. Even though inflation is running at 15% per annum, for blacks it is running at less than 9%. Why shouldn't they get the other 9%? Because it is inflationary, that is why.

This is what is so stupid about strikes for higher wages. If there is a strike for higher wages each time we raise prices, the battle against inflation will never be won. Is that so difficult to understand? If workers stop fighting for higher wages we'll have no inflation. Will that bring prices down — of course not! How do you expect businessmen to remain in business without making profits?

People calling for the opening of the books of account of firms have lost all sense of right and wrong. These are the private concern of our hard-working businessmen. Industry should not give in to workers. The door is always open. They can just go if they are not satisfied because there are so many others who are prepared to take their place.

If workers think they can run the factories they should start their own bakeries and other businesses in the homelands. Don't come again with the price of bread—the matter is now closed. 9 9

Rich man's budget

"Guns before butter". That is now a big business newspaper headlined the latest budget. On the financial pages inside the same newspaper it said: "Economists enthuse over no-shock budget".

How clear they make it that guns, for the rulers of South Africa, are necessary to defend profits! Defence spending allowed for in the budget increased by a massive R747 million; the bread subsidy by R45 million.

By Florence Bosch

The budget is presented once a year, usually in March. This year, because of the April election, it was presented in mid-August. What it represents is the government's plans for how much money is going to be spent from the taxes we pay and other sources on things like education, housing, medical care, railways and the military,

By looking at how this money is distributed, the priorities of the ruling class are made clear.

Huge revenues flowed into the country and into the government's hands, as a result of the high price of gold last year (all made possible, of course, by the super-exploitation of the black miners).

But the government has refused to put this money to the benefit of the mass of society in the form of better education, housing etc. Last year the government had a surplus of funds of about R1 500 million, which it chose to 'freeze' rather than spend.

And at the same time that all this money piled up in the banks, the crisis of homelessness, unemployment, bad education and starvation got worse. In the year that South Africa notched its highest growth rate since the Second World War, there were more people needing bread, homes and jobs than ever before.

So, boom or no boom, the government has made it clear that it has set its face against allowing money for the improvement of conditions of life for the masses. In this, it reflects the interests of the property-owning class it represents.

It shows not just that they are greedy (although greed they have in abundance!). It is because concessions to the working class weaken the profitability of capitalism and undermine the economic basis of the bosses' rule.

So they hold back and arm themselves to the teeth to prevent the masses from seizing what should be theirs.

While defence spending is to increase 40% from R1 890 million to R2 637 million, spending on housing will increase only 11% from R232 million to R257 million. Spending on education to increase 26% from R407 million to R512 million; on health, welfare and pensions 23% from R770 million to R947 million.

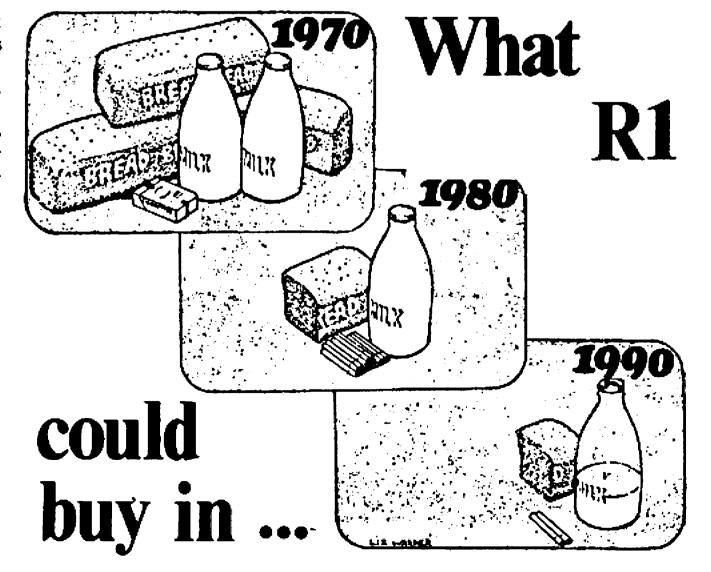

Set against the burning needs of the working people, these "increases" are like trying to empty the sea with a teaspoon.

At present there are only some 20 doctors (G.P.s) in Soweto—for a population of 1 500 000—while in the rural areas there is one doctor for every 20 000 patients.

Estimates of the current housing backlog are at least 500 000 homes—and only 30 000 are being built by the state a year. In Soweto, with a backlog of at least 35 000 homes, only just over 700 have been built in the last 18 months.

To overcome this backlog and take account of new needs, at least 2 million homes must be built in the next 18 years. At present prices, this alone would require at least R30 000 million—i.e. nearly R2 000 million a year.

When one takes into account an inflation rate of around 15%, it is clear that apart from defence there has been no big increase in spending.

Horwood said, when giving his budget speech, that around R233 million would have been needed to prevent the bread price from going up recently, but that this "could not be accommodated".

If Horwood and his henchmen are unable to "accommodate" cheap bread after a year of unprecedented boom, how much less so when the economy slows down, as it is already beginning to do?

After the 8% growth rate last year, it is likely that economic growth this year will be at most 4%, and next year 3%. For the workers, this will mean greater resistance by the bosses to demands for higher wages and trade union rights.

Wage limits

The government has already given the line by limiting public sector salary increases to around 12%. Whether they get away with it, of course, will depend on the resistance put up by black and white workers inside the public service and outside.

"A remarkable budget" is how Professor Botha of Wits University described it. Really? He says it is "remarkable" only because it did not demand more taxes of the companies and rich businessmen, and because the government is holding down spending.

But for the masses who starve in our society it is completely unremarkable and completely predictable. The rich are protecting their own, and making sure they have the weapons to do so. The irony is that the more they inflict poverty on the mass of society, the more they need weapons to defend themselves!

This budget is just another of the countless examples of how the rulers of South Africa demonstrate that they lack the capacity to achieve the all-round development of society. Only when the working class, who produce the wealth in society, also control it and are in charge of distributing it, will there be homes, food and jobs for all.

Rowntree

Dear Comrades,

"A large snowball has begun rolling down the hill. It is gathering speed and there is still a long way to the bottom." These were the concluding remarks of the trade union Convenor (senior shop steward) to the factory manager at Rowntree-Mackintosh's giant York plant only hours after Labour Party Young Socialists leafletted the day and office shifts with copies of an emergency resolution supporting the East London Rowntree strike which has been submitted to the national conference of the British Labour-Party. (See below—Editor)

The company's half-year results of their operations in 11 countries showed that pre-tax profits had doubled to £8,7 million [R15½ million], but that most of the increase came from the South African subsidiary.

Workers at the York factory have had similar experiences to those in East London, for example, when it comes to unskilled workers doing the job of fitters. Hundreds of redundancies and falling real wages over the past year in the York plant have highlighted the threat the continued existence of apartheid wage slavery constitutes to organised labour everywhere.

These facts are reflected in growing support for the strike. The white-collar section of the Engineering Union has sent a resolution to its National Executive urging "all members of unions in the UK to carry out no work on South African projects until a satisfactory settlement has been achieved". Increasingly sympathetic consideration is being given to the dispute by the main shopfloor union, the General and Municipal Workers' Union, after the case put to them in favour of SAAWU by the S.A.

"This conference declares its wholehearted support for the strike by members of SAAWU at Wilson-Rowntrees in East London, South Africa.

Recognising them to be in the forefront of the struggle against apartheld wage slavery, Conference demands the full reinstatement of all workers and the release from detention of all union activists, particularly the recently arrested union officials Thozamile Gqwetha and Sisa Njikelana.

Conference believes the strike is the latest example of the enormous advances made in building independent non-racial trades unions and pledges solidarity in their struggle.

Conference calls on the National Executive Committee to support the ANC and SACTU in the fight to organise and educate the mass of working people for the overthrow of the apartheid regime and the building of socialist democracy. Conference also supports the contribution being made by SALEP in this struggle.

Conference believes the strike highlights the link that exists between the struggles of workers in Britain and South Africa. British employers profit from the cheap labour of the racially enslaved black majority.

Conference calls on the NEC and all activists in the movement to urgently set about the task of building an effective campaign of economic sanctions based on the Labour and Trade Union Movement to isolate the apartheld regime. This should include the building of links between between British workers and their SA brothers and sisters at all levels in order to work to end the rule of our common oppressors."

—Resolution passed by York Labour Party and submitted to this year's Labour Party Conference

SAAWU members at City Hall, East London

Labour Education Project, Labour Party Young Socialists and Anti-Apartheid Movement (York Branch).

At national level, the Rowntree Combine Committee, made up of unions which organise the bulk of the 20 000-plus workforce, have demanded an early meeting with the Company Chairman and Director of Overseas Operations. Messages of support have been sent to SAAWU by the Transport, Shop and Bakery workers' unions. The local Trades Union Congress plans a rally in support of the strikers on 6 November to which the Labour Member of Parliament for the Constituency has been invited.

We were very interested to read in INQABA of SAAWU taking up the question of organising the unemployed. Long and bitter though the strike has been, we feel the prospects for international solidarity are growing as the labour movement appreciates the slogan common to our two movements, "an injury to one is an injury to all".

United in the fight to rid society of all oppression we look forward to defeating capitalism in South Africa and Britain and building a democratic and socialist World.

Sri Lanka

Dear Comrades

It is now one year since the General Strike in Sri Lanka was defeated by the arrest of several trade union leaders, the sacking of tens of thousands of trade unionists, and an armed State of Emergency. Since then the policy of the UNP regime has simply been more and more repression.

This has hit the trade union movement hard. The trial of union leaders has dragged on for a year, draining the time and financial resources of the unions, and many workers are still deprived of any livelihood. As no system of 'dole' exists in Sri Lanka, these workers and their families have been thrown into abject poverty.

Initially they were maintained through collections in the towns and donations of food from sympathetic peasants in their native villages, but now the unions have undertaken to organise self-help schemes. These involve the distribution of goods for sale by teams of union members going from door to door. It also provides a means of contact with the people, enabling the members to explain the union's cause.

Meanwhile the effects of last year's confrontation are also being felt by the government. Government offices, railways, etc, are still limping along in chaos without trained staff, relying on untrained youths and pensioners temporarily called out of retirement. This situation cannot last long, and our members will have to be given their jobs back. We are concerned that they return to work united and organised.

In the last six months the political situation in Sri Lanka has become completely unstable. The government may have won the strike but it has lost its support as a consequence.

New arrests and attacks on trade unionists; bloody pogroms against the Tamil minority including MP's, police and troops burning the Jaffna library, temple, market and houses; open fighting between different sections of the state forces; constitutional rigging with the scrapping of local government; two States of Emergency declared and press censorship introduced. The UNP's measures are becoming desperate. Race riots are their only means to prevent the unity of the people.

International support for the Sri Lankan workers has continued.

On behalf of our members I ask your readers, particularly those in the trade unions, for support for our cause.

Ingaba interviews

SUBHASH SETHI, President of All Escorts Employees' Union, Faridabad.

Workers must or

India under capitalism is a giant in torment. With a population of 700 million (almost double that of Africa) and vast natural resources, India is potentially one of the most productive and wealthy countries in the world. Instead, after centuries of plunder by British imperialism, followed by the parasitic rule of the rotten Indian capitalist class, the country has been reduced to indescribable poverty and seething social tensions.

Under the impact of the mass struggle, India became politically independent in 1947. British imperialism handed power to the representatives of Indian capitalism. Though the trappings of a parliamentary system were established, for the mass of the people democracy does not exist.

Enormous power has been concentrated in the hands of Indira Gandhi and her corrupt family clique at the head of the Congress government. This power is used in the most ruthless manner to enforce the interests of the big capitalists and landowners.

Under their rule, over half the Indian people live below the official poverty line. 200 million working people survive on less than 20c a day. 100 000 children die of mainutrition every month. 80% of children in the countryside will never go to school.

The Indian workers and peasants have increasingly been driven into struggle against these intolerable conditions. In every industrial city, heroic strikes have been fought in the face of murderous repression; in vast areas of the countryside, civil war reigns between landlords and landless peasants. In 1979, according to government calculations, there were 216 riots per day—nine riots every hour!

Pre-revolutionary turmoil

The capitalist class is completely incapable of solving the problems of the country. India has entered a period of pre-revolutionary turmoil. In the coming years the question of power will have to be decided—whether the present rulers will succeed in crushing the mass movement and stabilising their grip on the country, or whether their nightmare regime will be broken by the only force capable of displacing them: the 21-million strong urban proletariat at the head of the countless rural masses.

The most critical element in the workers' struggle will be that of unity, leadership and programme. Thus far, the magnificent movement of the workers, in the towns and on the land, and the no less heroic struggles of the peasants, have been held back not by the power of the state, but by the failures of an utterly bankrupt and opportunist leadership.

The leaders of the main organisations of the Indian working class—the Communist Party of India and the Communist Party of India (Marxist)—cling to the bankrupt position that India is not ripe for the overthrow of capitalism. Therefore the task, according to them, is to consolidate 'democracy' on a capitalist basis.

In practice, this means a series of compromises with reactionary capitalist leaders, watering down their half-hearted reformist programmes even more, and losing further support among the working people.

It is due to the failure of the workers' leaders to provide a socialist alternative that Indira Gandhi—brought down by a wave of mass struggle in 1977—was replaced by an equally bankrupt capitalist regime, and was then able to return to office last year.

But the election result itself revealed the isolation of the 'victorious' Gandhi regime. According to the official figures (despite widespread vote-rigging in Mrs Gandhi's favour), little more than half the electorate voted; in all, less than a quarter of Indian voters supported Mrs Gandhi!

In office, the Gandhi clique have continued to enrich themselves ist leadership within the mass organisations of the Indian working class can provide a rallying point for the workers and peasants in struggle and show a way out of the present crisis. Organised on a socialist programme, the Indian working class can draw behind it the mass of the people, demolish the capitalist system and, on the basis of nationalised production under democratic working-class control, develop the resources of the country to meet the need of the mass of the people.

The fate of the Indian revolution is of vital concern to the workers of South Africa and the entire world. If successful, it would enormously strengthen the workers in every country; if crushed, it would be a demoralising blow to workers everywhere.

of the people are living in the villages. Some are peasants, some are landless labourers. But when they go to the cities they see the capitalists living like princes, with cars, big homes and servants.

Due to all these social evils the masses want revolution, they want to change society. They realise they are working hard and getting nothing. But the main problem is the lack of revolutionary organisation, the lack of national leadership.

The left in India is split into many parties like the Communist Party of India, the Communist Party of India (Marxist), the Communist Party of India (Marxist-Leninist), the Revolutionary Socialist Party. But none of them provide a real alternative, a revolutionary leadership for the struggling workers and peasants.

ganise for power

while building up the machinery of a police state to protect themselves against the anger of the masses.

Their latest reactionary measure has been to declare a total ban on strikes in the main sectors of the economy. A punishment of a year in prison is laid down for organising strikes, and 6 months for taking part in a strike!

These attacks will spur the workers on to even more determined struggles. Country-wide protests are aiready taking place. Everything points at an explosive sharpening of the class struggle in the period ahead.

The capitalist class has no answer to the struggles of the workers and peasants except increasingly barbarous repression. Already sections of the ruling class are calling up the dark forces of communalism (ultranationalist fascism) as a bludgeon against resistance among minority national groups.

Nationalist movements in different states of India, reflecting a mood of despair, are struggling to break free from the hated regime in New Delhi. Under capitalism, India faces a nightmare future of ruin and disintegration.

Only the development of a Marx-

INQABA has discussed some of the crucial questions facing the Indian working class with Comrade Subhash Sethi, a union leader from the Delhi area and a supporter of the ideas of Marxism. Shortly after giving this interview, Comrade Subhash Sethi was a leader of a 30 000 strong demonstration of workers in Delhi against the antistrike legislation.

Many of the tasks of the Indian workers—in particular, the building of a united national trade union movement—are similar to the tasks which face us in South Africa today. Many lessons can be learned from the experience of the workers in India which will assist us in carrying forward our work.

Workers in South Africa are eager for information about the prerevolutionary movement of the Indian workers and peasants which has brilliantly begun over the last period. Could you describe this movement?

Sixty per cent of the people in our country are living below the poverty line. That means earning less than two rupees a day (20c). 74% to 80%

None of the political parties is working democratically. This is a big problem and that is why they are divided. Anyone who criticises the leadership is sent out of the party. Also if he wants any change in the policy or programme, he is sent out of the party.

Most of the trade unions are controlled by political parties and work in the same undemocratic way.

What we need is to build one country-wide trade union organisation that will work democratically and carry forward the struggle for change. In the meantime we will also be building a revolutionary political leadership.

The name of Gandhi is well-known in South Africa since Mahatma Gandhi was active in South Africa as well. Can you tell us about the regime which Indira Gandhi has set up in India today?

No doubt Indira Gandhis's family were involved in the fight for independence, but she was not elected for this reason. 60% of the people have voted against her, always. Indira Gandhi game back to power in 1980 because the previous Janata

The 1974 railway strike involved nearly two million workers

Party government did not give what they had promised, and because of the failure of the main workers' parties to provide any clear alternative.

Indira Gandhi's Congress Party is a nationwide party, but the other parties are regional parties. The Communist Party of India (Marxist) is the biggest left party. It is the ruling party in three states—West planning a strike on that day. But Indira Gandhi knows that the national trade union leadership do not have the courage to fight. After passing this law repression will increase. After that some workers' leaders will be forced to come out in opposition because of the pressure of the workers. The workers will demand of their leaders that they

"This government of Indira Gandhi is pro-capitalist, anti-trade union and anti-working class."

Bengal, Kerala and Tripura. In other parts the Communist Party of India has a hold. If the left put up a united front nationally Indira Gandhi could not win. She has to use bribery and vote-rigging in order to stay in power.

But the left parties don't unite. They are Stalinist parties, by which I mean that the upper leadership are the bosses of the parties. They dictate, they don't want democracy in the party, they don't want to lead the revolutionary struggles of the masses. That is why Mrs Gandhi is able to stay in power.

This government of Indira Gandhi is pro-capitalist, anti-trade union and anti-working class. A new law has just been passed to ban strikes. But I tell you, half a million workers will march on 17 August to say to Indira Gandhi, you shall not pass this law. We in Faridabad are organise a united struggle.

What has been your experience of the struggle to create a united trade union movement?

Until 1974 I was working at Escort in Faridabad, when I was sacked for trade union activities. There were six trade unions in Escort, in a workforce of 10 000. The strongest of those unions were led by the CPI (M), the CPI and the Congress Party (Indira). I said to the leaders of the unions, why are we divided into six parts? We are crying that the employers are exploiting us, but we are doing nothing for the workers. We can't get anything until we unite. The leaders agreed and said we should form a front. I said no, we should form one organisation, one union, and the workers should elect the leadership. The leaders said no. Then I went to the workers directly. I told them of my discussion with the leaders and explained to them that if we are divided our demands will not be met. The workers agreed. Then I asked them, why don't we form one union and leave those other leaders? So they all left their unions and we formed one union.

For the last four years we have had elections every year, and I have been elected President every time.

After we formed this union we had a strike. It involved 10 000 workers, and we won it in three days.

At first the employer said he would kill me. He said he would fire his factory before he would talk to me. But after three days he agreed to talk. Then we had a meeting with the management and got an increase of 125 Rupees (R12,50) per month per worker. And within three years we got another increase of 350 Rupees (R35,00). In the history of India there have never been such increases in such a short period.

On that basis I went to the workers of the whole region of Faridabad. I asked them, why are we divided, why should we not form one organisation as we have formed in Escort?

The workers agreed. We organised 15 000 workers more. Now we are the strongest organisation in Faridabad.

Within the next two years our aim is to organise 100 000 workers into our organisation, out of 200 000 workers in the region. They will come into our organisation because all the workers can see we are following the right path, we are following the democratic path and we are fighting for the workers' interests.

How does democracy operate inside your union?

Democracy means, the leadership must be elected by the workers, if the workers believe they are right. I may be the leader of our organisation, but the leadership can be changed if it is not working in the interest of the working class. So I am not saying that I should be the leader, but that the leader should be elected every year. Any leader who is not working for the interests of the workers should be dismissed by election, according to the will of the workers.

What are the prospects for building trade union unity in India as a whole?

On the basis of our work in Faridabad we will try to form one trade union organisation all over India. I am working around Delhi but other people are organising the workers in every, other part of the country. They are many and they are militant, but they cannot fight if they are divided. They will come together, because they have similar ideas. When that happens we will form one national trade union organisation. That will provide the basis for a united political leadership of the working class.

What is the role of the present political leadership of the workers?

All the workers and the left should be united on the basis of a program and policy that is decided democratically. Every leader should be elected, from the bottom, to the city committee, district committee, state committee or central committee of the organisation.

But at present the left parties are run by a dictatorial system. That is why there are splits. If there had been democracy in the party, there would be no need for splits. With democracy, the reformist leaders will be sent out because the working class want a militant leadership, they do not want reformists who cooperate with the authorities.

Bombay—capitalist weatth and working-class poverty

The CP leaders have had many opportunities to build a mass revolutionary movement in India. But because of their policies they have always thrown these opportunities away.

Instead they have taken their line from Moscow and betrayed the struggles of the Indian workers and peasants.

The most notorious betrayal was in 1942-1945. At that time there was the 'Quit India' movement to drive British imperialism out of India.

The GPI opposed that movement, it opposed it because of Russia because the Stalinist regime was in alliance with the British imperialists against Germany at that time. Because of its attitude to the independence movement the CPI-was held in low esteem by the masses of India. If the CPI had been willing to support the struggle for national independence, then the workers' movement would have become very strong, it would have led the national struggle. Instead, the people saw that the CP went against the movement, it was helping British imperialism. People were being hanged, people were sacrificing, and the CP went against it.

loday the workers are very militant but the leadership is leading a princely life. The poor people are not able to eat; 70 million people don't have houses but the leaders live like princes. How can it be possible for the people to believe in such a leadership?

I can give you an example. In 1979 there was a one-day strike in Faridabad. This call was supported by all the left trade unions, so there was a complete strike. Everything was closed.

The police prohibited any assembly of workers. We had a meeting already arranged but the police said, the order has been made so you have to leave this place. The workers said no. Then one of the police inspectors fired and a worker was killed. The workers then dispersed, and two workers carried the body away. The police inspector said, don't touch the body, but they ignored him. Then he fired again and both the workers were killed.

Victims of the brutal Indian police, their eyes destroyed by needles and acid

The other workers were watching this. After the police inspector fired, they ran at him and killed him. Minutes later, huge contingents of police arrived. They fired at the workers and more than 50 were killed.

The workers had the support of all the people in the area. There was a mood of militancy. But this situation was turned into defeat by the leadership of the CPI and the CPI (M). The workers wanted to stay out on strike the second day but the leaders in Delhi said no, no strike. So the workers went to work.

We were forced to go underground for three months. The workers said to me, what kind of leader are you—you tell us to go to work after 50 of us have been killed? I said, can there be a complete strike if only our union calls it? If the CP leaders ask you to work, can I alone ask you to strike?

The workers were betrayed, very much betrayed. From that day the workers have been thinking very carefully before taking any action—whether under this leadership we should fight, or not.

How do you think the task of building the workers' organisation can be carried forward in the period ahead? I am going to collect 200 000 Rupees (R20 000) from the Escort workers for the purpose of organising the exploited, unorganised workers. We will ask 30 Rupees (R3) from each worker. We will explain to them that the unorganised are getting only 200 Rupees (R20) a month, whereas we get 600 Rupees (R60). We will explain that unless we can organise the working class in millions, there can be no social change.

If this money is collected we can take on at least 15 to 20 full-time organisers. At present we only have 8 to 10 cadres working full-time for the union. In India the financial problem is a very big problem of trade union organisation. This problem has been caused by our leaders. Many of them are very dishonest. They have used the workers' money for themselves.

You have mentioned the problem of money and financial control, which is crucial to prevent corruption in the leadership. How do you tackle this problem in the union?

Our union is one of the most organised and financially stable in North India because we account to the workers, and the workers have control over the union's finances. We show the workers every month, this is the income, this is the expenditure, and this is in the bank and in cash. We cannot draw more than 1 000 Rupees (R100) from the bank at once, and we cannot draw more than 3 000 (R300) in a month. If we need to draw more than 10 000 Rupees, the whole of the Executive Committee has to meet: and we have to get permission from a general meeting of the workers to draw so much money for such and such work. Then, if they give permission, the whole Committee has to sign.

All these instructions have been given to the bank. This is the system we have. In the coming years we will have a very strong financial position. With these resources we will be able to meet our target of organising 100 000 workers.

We would like to turn now to the relations between India and the surrounding countries. A lot is said about the conflict between India and Pakistan. Can you give us your views on that?

Indira Gandhi says that we have a danger from Pakistan, and Pakistan's Zia says that he has a danger from India. But Indira Gandhi has no danger from Pakistan, not at all, she is only making excuses to divert the attention of the people. The people are not afraid of Pakistan. The only thing the people want is to change society, they want to throw out the capitalists.

There are so many struggles in different corners of India. The peasants have been fighting in Maharashtra, in Karnataka, in Tamil Nadu, in Haryana. They want lower prices, cheaper fertilisers, lower electricity costs. At least 100 have been killed.

In Bangalore, 130 000 public sector workers were on strike for 70 days. They were only defeated due to a weakness of leadership.

All these struggles are against Indira Gandhi, not against Pakistan. We need a national organisation to expand these struggles all over the country. There is no danger at all from Pakistan or China. The people are not thinking about it at all, they are only thinking about changing society.

What has been the attitude of the Indian workers' leaders towards the struggles of the workers in Sri Lanka and other countries?

The more militant workers' leaders know the history of the revolutionary Sri Lankan working class, and know how the general strike was defeated. But the mass of the workers are not yet very conscious of the working-class struggle internationally. That is due to the nationalist policies of the workers' political leaders. The CPI (M) and the CPI (ML) gave no help to the Sri Lankan revolutionaries at all. As for the CPI, it takes its line mainly from Russia.

We often hear about the caste system in India, which splits up the people and harshly discriminates against those who are born into the lower castes. How do you fight against this system in the workers' movement?

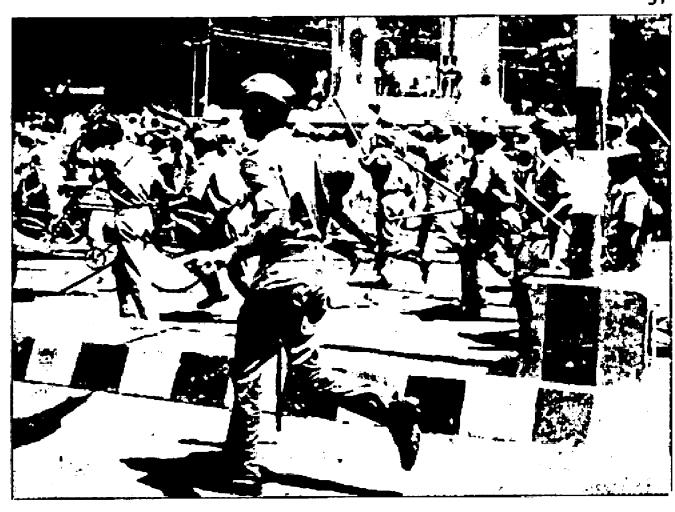

Under capitalism it is very, very difficult to overcome caste divisions. Society is in such a form that caste differences are linked to economic and social privilege and power. The harijans (the lowest caste; the so-called 'untouchables'—Ed.), for example, have almost no land, while the highest caste, the Brahmins, have among them many landlords and capitalists.

But the workers' leaders have failed to campaign on these issues, and so there is no clarity among the masses about the way in which casteism and religion are being used to divide and oppress them.

In our agitation we concentrate on speaking against capitalism, why the workers are being exploited and how we can overthrow the capitalist system. When the working class takes power, casteism will be eliminated. But among the cadres we should always discuss these questions. We need to be clear about it at all times or we will have problems in the future.

Some of our leaders in the South African liberation movement still regard Indira Gandhi as an ally. She even gives out medals for the struggle of the South African masses. What is your comment on this?

Police attacking demonstrators we must use the time now to build that leadership. The conditions are very favourable. Thousands and The consequences of the Indian revolution will be very great. India is a country with the second-largest population in the world. If the revolution comes to India and capitalism is thrown out, the whole of Asia and indeed the whole world will be affected.

"With the revolutionary cadre and the trade unions united, the revolution will be successful."

Indira Gandhi did not fight for the masses, either in India or in South Africa, not at all. The working people of India are against Indira Gandhi. The people of your country should know this.

What do you see as the prospects for the Indian workers' struggle in the period ahead?

In the next elections Indira Gandhi will probably win again because no alternative is being provided by the leaders of the left. If she does not win, then other rightist parties will come to power. But in the election after that, definitely we can come to power. By "we" I mean our organisations, like the CPI (M) and the CPI, when we have reformed them. The people will demand a leadership and a government that will make an end to the oppressive thousands of cadres in the CPI, the CPI (ML) and the CPI (M) want to bring in their own revolutionary policies instead of the reformist policies of the leaders. If we can unite these cadres on the basis of a revolutionary programme, we can establish democracy in the parties and replace any leaders who don't want to struggle for the demands of the workers and peasants. If this kind of party is formed in India, the left will be united, and a socialist government will be elected.

It is possible that the capitalists will not give up their power peacefully, they will end democracy if they see that the workers and peasants will put their own parties in power. In that case there will be a fight. But with the revolutionary cadre united, and with the trade unions united, the revolution will be successful.

The things you have explained will contribute an enormous enthusiasm to the South African workers. Like the workers in India, we have the task of building a mass united trade union movement on the basis of a Marxist programme. We must do everything possible to link our struggles together, and with those of workers throughout Africa and internationally.

Ciskei "independence" —

On December 4th this year, Ciskei, the poorest and most overcrowded of the ten tribal Bantustans, will be the fourth to get "independence", after Transkei, Bophutatswana and Venda. "We are starving—"siyalamba"—its people are crying.

deficiency diseases are rife among the people. Ciskei faces a future of famine.

On top of this human misery, Pretoria's mass "resettlement programme" has doubled Ciskei's population and led to very serious overcrowding. The most striking feature of the landscape is lines of tiny lavatories across the dusty hillsides marking the sites of resettlement camps, where tens of thousands of people have been dumped after being classified as surplus.

Only a quarter of the people living in the Transkei and Ciskei have a right to any land at all.

The "independence" of the Ciskei reserve is yet another shot by the SA ruling class to undermine the workers' organisation and unity through "divide and rule" tactics and maintain the cheap labour

By Teboho Phiri

Bantustans are a dead end. In he face of this Bantustan menace, all class fighters should constantly point out that our real enemy is the South African capitalist class, on whose behalf the Sebe's attack us.

No amount of puppet "independence" for Bantustans, no new passbooks or fancy 'citizen stamps', can change our determination to get rid of the South African oppressive system. To do that we will have to destroy not only the Bantustan system, but the capitalism which oppresses and exploits us.

Our task is to organise our forces and take up the programme of Marxism, in order to overthrow the apartheid regime and the power of the bosses—which lies at the root of our suffering—and establish a democratic workers' state.

Siyalamba!

Ciskei covers 3200 square miles and has a resident population estimated at 660,000. It is a wretchedly under-developed part of the SA economy. There is no Ciskeian economy to speak about and job opportunities are virtually non-existent.

In the 30 factories which employ a total of about 3.000 wage workers, conditions are atrocious. There is no minimum wage regulation and wages are as low as R9,00 per week. Two-thirds of "Clakel citizens" earnings come from migrant workers.

Economically, the Ciskei is nothing more than a labour camp for SA capitalists and a dumping ground for those they cannot provide with jobs.

Two out of every five "Ciskeians" of working age are unemployed. Kwashiorkor and other nutritional system.

Many African workers and their families will lose their SA citizenship and will be handed over to "Chief Minister" Sebe and co-criminals. The dirty work of SA capitalists will now be executed by the Ciskei Bantustan government—to 'tame' and 'control' the workforce.

Anti-trade union

The Ciskei puppets are rabidly anti-trade union. MAWU, an affiliate of FOSATU, has been banned in the Ciskei. Recently 205 trade unionists of SAAWU were arrested in Ciskei—for, among other crimes, singing "freedom songs." This is not the first time that Ciskeian police have acted against the East London black trade unions.

All workers are aware that the

The health service

Poor patients victimised

Today in South Africa capitalism is completely unable to provide adequate medical facilities, thus putting the lives of people at risk. The capitalists are pushing forward a policy of cuts in the health service, regardless of the fate of the sick.

In a society based on profit, the satisfaction of the financial greed of the rich always comes before any measures that protect the life and health of the masses are attended to.

In times of boom the capitalists make some concessions to the demands of the workers and provide amounts of money for the social services, of which health forms a part. This happened in the West after the Second World War.

Why cuts?

But with the world-wide crisis of capitalism, profits decline, and drastic measures are taken. Cuts in wages, cuts in public services become the order of the day.

This is precisely what is happening in South Africa today under the present crisis. In his budget speech, the Administrator of the Transvaal, Mr. Cruywagen, said that "the Transvaal Province is deeply in the red and hospital services will be one of the Province's functions to be cut back." (Star 6/8/81) He expected that the 1981/82 allowances would fall R50m short of what he considered should be spent.

At the same time, the MEC in charge of hospitals in the Transvaal, Dr. Latsky, arguing against an increase in nurse's salaries, said "because of a lack of money and the fact that the gold price has fallen sharply, the province could not offer salaries so high that the private sector could not compete." (Star 6/8/81)

The present crisis in the health service is a direct result of the low level of state expenditure and the cuts in the salaries of the workers.

The poor pay and the unpreparedness of the capitalists and their arrogant spokesmen, like Cruywagen and Latsky, to solve the problem has already led to defections by nurses to the private sector.

The only reason why the private sector is paying higher wages is because of the shortage of skilled labour which causes the capitalists to compete against each other for such labour on the basis of wages. This whole mess is made still worse by the racial restrictions against black nurses, excluding them from many jobs.

The defection by radiographers at Baragwanath is but one example of the general disillusionment in the hospitals. This has resulted in staff shortages which according to the By D. Sikhakhane.

Star is already 36% in paramedical services, 26% in nursing posts and 19% in medical staff.

And with the economy showing no sign of improvement, there is no short term solution of the crisis.

Results

The end result, of course, is greater and greater suffering of the sick. The poor patients will have to be sent home to die rather than for the capitalists to pay higher salaries.

Already the Superintendent of the H.F. Verwoerd Hospital is saying, "the hospital will have to close more wards if the staff situation does not improve before October." (Star 5/8/81) At the time he made this statement, 238 beds were already not in use due to staff shortages."

In Pretoria by July, 179 beds in Provincial hospitals were not available; in Vereeniging 58 beds have been closed. Johannesburg Hospital alone has closed nearly half of its 2 000 beds. Hospital staff there, because of labour shortage, had worked 13 476 hours of overtime between mid-May and mid-lane!

· All this clearly exposes the raw and hideous nature of capitalism.

The South African masses live under horrible conditions, and can enjoy neither good health nor a normal expectation of life. Where labour is cheap, life is cheap.

Way forward

The only way in which these problems can be solved is by the working class waging a struggle against the capitalist system with the ultimate objective of taking power and establishing a democratic workers' state.

On this basis, the provision of proper housing, decent wages, and jobs for all will enormously improve general health.

At the same time, by bringing all health facilities and services together on a planned basis, under democratic workers' control, a massive expansion of health care will take place to meet the needs of all the people.

The chaos and poor wages make it evident that trade union organizations are lacking in the public service.

It is essential therefore for the nurses, paramedics, and all health workers to organise themselves into one trade union with the ultimate aim of linking up with the struggles of all the workers in South Africa.

Some demands that the health workers would rally round in struggle are:

- A minimum wage of R90 a week!
- All wages indexed to inflation!
- Adequate training facilities,
 without racial discrimination!
- No reduction of services!
- No closure of wards!
- Jobs for all who are qualified, and no job reservation!

(Kliptown) The battle

The bitter persecution of families made homeless by the state is taking place throughout the country. In Kliptown these families explained their desperate plight: "We are being harassed by officials because they claim we are illegal tenants and do not qualify to be here. They have threatened us with arrest but we know no other home.

"Even if they arrest us and find us guilty we will come right back again.

"Some of us have been told to return to our homelands but we find it difficult to live there because our children and babies are dying from malnutrition and starvation.

"We have come here to earn a living because there are no job opportunities where we come from."

A mother of a two-year-old child said: "What else are we expected to do? The authorities demolished our shacks and we have been sleeping in the open since last week.

"It is terribly cold at night and we have to do our best to keep our children and babies warm. If we continue to sleep without a roof over our heads we are all going to end up in hospital."

Another evicted person, a mother of eight, had to sleep in an old car for 13 months. She described her plight when she was discharged from hospital:

"On return I found that I had no home because the shack had once more been demolished. I had nowhere to go and the only place I had was my husband's disused car.

"I and my baby slept in the disused car until November last year when my family moved into a disused stable. We lived in there until two weeks ago and were forced to move out because it was unbearably cold.

"The owner of the property gave us permission to put up a shack which is more comfortable than the stable."

Nyanga: workers gather as police destroy their dwellings

By Monde Mlamoli

As a result of the capitalist system in South Africa, conditions of life for the families of migrant workers in the reserves have become increasingly intolerable. These families thus move to the cities in search of jobs, and hope in this way to avoid the certain starvation they face if they were to remain in the reserves.

In the cities, however, over two million workers have been thrown into unemployment and the crisis of housing for workers and their families has deepened. The cities are also hit by higher rents and food prices, with the result that workers are constantly engaged in battle with the bosses for higher wages to meet these conditions.

This can be noted in the tremendous growth of the trade union movement. As the conditions in the townships become worse, the trade union movement is finding it more and more urgent to link up their struggles in the factories with the struggles in the townships.

A partial victory was achieved by workers at Crossroads when the state was attempting to deport "squatters" to the reserves. These gains were achieved because of the organised determination and will to resist of the people of Crossroads.

At Langa and Nyanga the state has refused to give way. They moved in during mid-winter and falling rain to smash the shelters of the "squatters" and then deported them to the Transkei.

The state could act ruthlessly because a large number of the workers in the camps are unemployed. There is also an absence of organisation similar to that in Crossroads.

The reason for the state's brutality has nothing to do with its claim that prostitution, crime and illegal sale of alcohol was rife and that agitators were inciting the "squatters" to defy the state. It goes deeper than this.

By this action the National Party leadership wanted to prove to the right wing in the party who have accused verligtes of selling out, that kragdadigheid and baasskap are still the order of things. It hopes in this way to silence the voices of discontent in the party as well as resolve the splits racking the National Party.

The smashing and burning of the so-called squatter camps by the state will not stop the flow of workers (unemployed) to the cities in search of jobs. For the reserves have no jobs to offer and the barren land is incapable of supporting even their basic subsistence.

The ability of the state to act with impunity against unemployed workers and their families in search of a livelihood must be broken by the working class, by linking up the struggles of the unemployed with those of the employed. The Union of Unemployed Workers started by SAAWU should intervene directly in these struggles.

It is the bosses' system which is responsible for unemployment, poverty and starvation in the reserves, and not the working class. Inqaba stands for jobs for all; adequate housing in the cities for the families of the working class; and unconditional defence of the so-called squatter camps by the workers' movement.

In the final analysis the capitalist system is incapable of providing the basic needs of society. It has proven time and again its inability to provide sufficient housing, health care, living wages and jobs for all.

The only solution is to destroy the bosses' power and get rid of the capitalist system, nationalising the commanding heights of the economy under workers' management and control.

For under socialism the needs of society will be taken care of on the basis of need and not profit. It is the only guarantee of adequate housing and jobs for all.

British Labour Party: Two steps forward—one step back

The capitalist press is full of celebration at the 'victories' of the right wing at the recent British Labour Party conference: the re-election of Denis Healey as Deputy Leader against the radical challenge of Tony Benn, and the defeat of some left wingers in the elections to the National Executive Committee.

But in fact the whole course of the six-month election campaign for the Deputy Leadership, conducted on a more democratic basis than ever before, showed the increasing support for socialist policies among the rank and file.

Not since the epic conference of 1918 when, fired by the Russian Revolution, the Labour Party adopted the socialist clause in its constitution, has there been such debate in the affiliated trade unions and the party as a whole.

Even before the results were declared, this debate gave a resounding victory to Labour's rank and file and those committed to socialism. Pre-election rallies of the left candidate, Tony Benn, attracted enthusiastic audiences of 2 to 3 thousand.

This confirms the active workers' commitment to Party democracy and the firm support for radical policies. It reflects the serious attitude of most activists who, through the experience of 17 years of post-war Labour governments, have become convinced that only a mass socialist Labour Party committed to break with capitalism can make an end to poverty, mass unemployment and insecurity.

In the event, the election of the right wing's Denis Healey, vociferously backed by the bosses' press and former Labour Prime' Ministers, by a narrow margin of 0,8%, was a disappointment to activists not only in Britain but the world over.

This result, however, only serves to underline the rift between those in the Party who want to compromise with capitalism and those who don't. The losses on the left were due solely to the manoeuvres of right-wing trade union leaders who swung their block votes behind their candidates in direct defiance of the majority of the active rank and file. Politically, it emphasises the bankruptcy of the right.

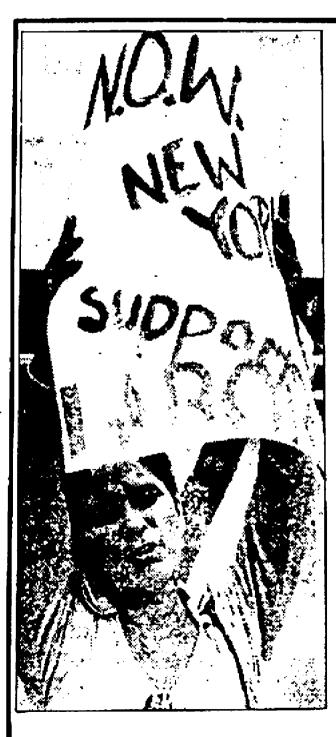

These setbacks will only be temporary. The pro-capitalist policies of the right wing against the background of a deep-rooted economic crisis can only mean further attacks on workers' living standards. Inevitably, new tides of mass struggle will increase the radicalisation of the labour and trade union movement and further reduce the grip of the right.

The continuing shift among Labour's ranks towards socialist policies was reflected by the militant mood of the Conference itself. Delegates reflected the workers' hatred for the nuclear arms race and their determination to commit a future Labour government to socialist policies. Conference voted to support Labour town and city councils who break the law in the struggle against the Conservative government's public spending cuts.

The overwhelming support for Benn from the constituency delegates (representing the ordinary rank and file) is the result which deserves the most attention. Not for long will the movement continue to accept a Parliamentary leadership which refuses to carry out the policies passed by Conference. Also the position of many so-called 'left' MP's, who shied away from opposing the right by abstaining in the National Organisation of Women activist: in step with organised labour.

nal Notes

Deputy Leadership election, will no doubt be reconsidered.

Similarly, any attempt by procapitalist right-wingers to start a witch-hunt against Marxism in the Party will spark off a determined fight-back by the rank and file, which will embed Marxism even more deeply in the workers' organisations.

The struggle between the ranks of the movement and right-wing Party and trade union leaders will undoubtedly continue in the period ahead. Also in the trade unions, activists will fight to break the grip of conservative leaders and commit the unions to struggle for the workers' interests.

The Conference has opened up a new period for the Party. The more the capitalist crisis deepens, the more determined will become the workers' search for a way out.

The radicalisation of the most oppressed sections of society, together with the struggles of the workers on the political plane, will refresh the Party with new members especially from the youth. This pressure will continue pushing Labour leftward, transforming it into a combat organisation capable of defeating the Tory government and their system.

Under these conditions the ideas of Marxism combined with the experience of the workers will lay the basis for solving the problems of capitalism. Marxism will become a mass force.

POLAND

An "Address to all workers of Eastern Europe" was passed by the Congress of the Polish trade union movement Solidarity at Gdansk, 5-10 September. It concluded:

"...We are an authentic representative body of workers, with ten million members, born out of workers' strikes. Our aim is the struggle to improve all workers' conditions of life. We support those among you who have chosen the difficult struggle for a free trade union movement. We believe that, in the not-too-distant future, our representatives will be able to meet and exchange trade union experiences."

USA: Reaganomics at the crossroads

The September 19th march in Washington of over 500 000 (many more than expected) came in the midst of intense mass protest demonstrations which are sweeping across the country in dozens of cities and state capitals—California, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota, New York etc.

This demonstration, the biggest in Washington for twenty years and led by organised labour (the AFL-CIO), outstripped in numbers the anti-war and civil rights marches of the 1960s.

It reflects the growing anger of a genuine cross-section of the American people against the monster of 'Reaganomics'—savage cuts in public spending on domestic and social programmes. Already $35 000 million dollars are to be cut in the fiscal year 1981/2 which starts in October.

Participating were local government workers from cities in the mid-West; pensioners from Charlottesville, Virginia; New Jersey iron workers; members of show business unions. Warmly cheered by the other marchers and onlookers were the PATCO air traffic controllers, victims in August of a lock-out imposed by Reagan.

Eight months into Reagan's Presidency, America is sinking deep into a crisis of sluggish growth, high interest rates (20%) and unemployment. Worst hit are the youth.

In 1980, joblessness among teenagers stood at 18% and among black youth it reached 39%. This is merely an average—in certain cities (Detroit, for example), the figure for black teenagers was as high as 60%.

Reagan's honeymoon with the US electorate seems finally to be losing its lustre. Even close friends in Wall Street are worried about his ability to balance the budget. His economic policies are losing him the confidence of the stock exchange gamblers world-wide.

With economic clouds gathering, the march on Washington could be the beginning of a showdown with the 14 million organised workers and their families. With plans of a further $16 600 million spending cuts that will erode the pensions of the elderly, government workers, the disabled and others, and assault the education system, fierce future struggles are on the cards.

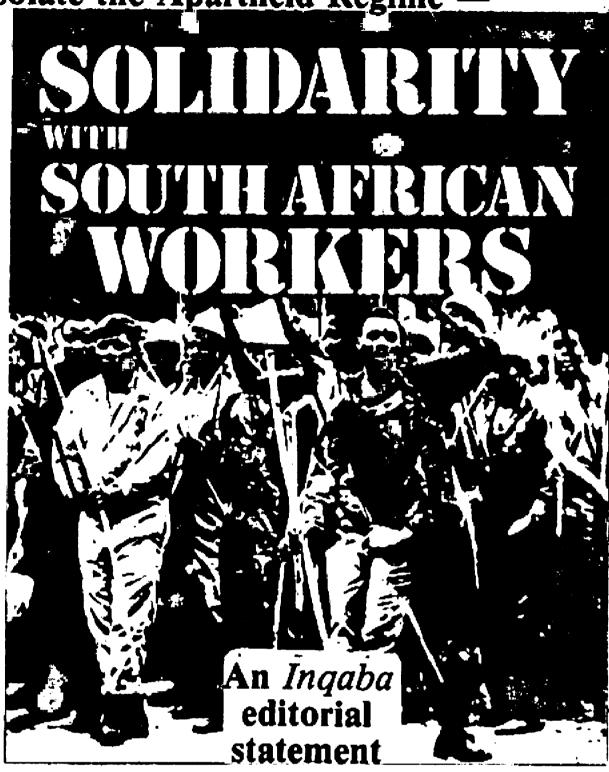

Such struggles will inevitably lead to the radicalisation of the masses and the search for an alternative. Organised labour's intervention and bold lead in founding a third party based on labour could be decisive.

The party of Labour in America would act as a pole of attraction to the mighty American working class and could rapidly take on Reagan and the class he represents.

Such a Labour Party, developing a socialist programme, could open up a struggle to make the 1980s the last decade of crisis-ridden capitalism and of imperialism, through the taking of power by the working class.

Labour must give a lead!

Isolate the Apartheid Regime

"The unity of the workers of all countries is a necessity arising out of the fact that the capitalist class, which rules over the workers, does not limit its rule to one country... Capitalist domination is international. That is why the workers' struggle in all countries for their emancipation is only successful if the workers fight jointly against international capital."

— Lenin, Draft and Explanation of a Programme for the Social Democratic Party, 1896.

For the struggling black workers in South Africa, especially those employed by multinationals, the need to build links of effective solidarity with their fellow-workers overseas is becoming increasingly clear.

Capitalist production, and with it capitalist rule, has spread around the world. All countries depend on trade with each other. Big companies no longer produce for a national market alone, but for a world market. Their factories and their workforce are spread over many countries in a single network of production.

The South African economy forms an integral part of the world capitalist system. It is a major supplier of minerals and other raw materials to the advanced industrial countries, and provides them with a small but invaluable market for manufactured goods.

Also through investment in South Africa, (direct investment alone totalled R23 000 million in 1979), the capitalist class internationally has acquired a huge stake in the apartheid system. For the capitalists, these investments are a "valuable source of dividend income" (Financial Times, London, 26 May 1981). One example is the multinational Mitchell Cotts group, whose profits in South Africa shot up by 66% in 1980 and now amount to £4,5 million—half the total profits of the group!

These profits depend completely on the merciless exploitation of black labour. Thus, according to a recent UN report, of 19 foreign manufacturing companies in South Africa who were willing to give details of their wage scales, seven paid less than the average industrial wage.

With the growth of the world economy, the class struggle has become international. The capitalist class internationally band together against the workers, creating and manipulating governments to enforce their common interests.

Western capitalist states, despite their democratic shell, actively support the apartheid regime which is the guardian of their interests. This was reflected, for example, in Foreign Minister Botha's "friendly" meeting with US President Reagan on 15 May 1981 and in the US veto of a United Nations Security Council resolution condemning the South African invasion of Angola.

Against the international machinery of the capitalist class, the workers of-different countries need to build unity on the basis of their own class interests.

No reliance can be placed on the 'liberal' capitalists and their hypocritical 'disapproval' of the bloody methods by which their interests in South Africa and elsewhere are enforced. Only the working class itself has the capacity to abolish the vicious repression which capitalism has imposed on working people.

In the struggle against the apartheid regime, real solidarity with the South African workers' movement can be based only on the power of organised labour internationally.

In the past, South African workers looking for solidarity to the international labour movement have been disappointed by the condescension and failure to respond of the top trade union leaders.

But with the worsening crisis of capitalism and the growing struggles of the workers in every country, the organisations of the working class are being transformed.

The bureaucratic leadership which established itself in the advanced capitalist countries during the years of boom and stability is increasingly being challenged by a militant rank and file. Great opportunities now exist of changing the old conservative policies not only nationally but also internationally. and committing the workers' organisations to a position of active class solidarity.

The potential for international working-class unity in action was reflected in the Leyland strike earlier this year. As in 1977, British Leyland workers—themselves facing savage attacks by the British Leyland bosses—immediately proved willing to support their South African fellow-workers.

Shop-floor meetings were held to decide what action to take. At British Leyland's Cowley plant, Oxford, a resolution was passed calling for maximum support for the strikers and blacking (refusing to handle) goods to South Africa. This call was supported by the local branch of the Transport and General Workers' Union and the Combine Committee of shop stewards from all the BL plants.

Leading officials of the TGWU, the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions and the British Labour Party expressed support for the strikers and protested at Leyland South Africa's sacking of the strikers.

Communication

In the meantime, in South Africa, the strikers were standing firm. Support was increasing from other trade unions, from the black population and from sections of whites. It was this pressure, combined with the pressure from the labour movement abroad, that forced the Leyland management to retreat and re-open negotiations with the workers' union NUMARWOSA.

This rapid response to the Leyland workers' struggle was only made combined by the channels of communication that have been built up between independent trade unions in South Africa and the labour movement internationally.

Important lessons can be learned from the Leyland strike and other actions (e.g. the Pilkington struggle of 1976 and the Unilever struggle of 1978) where international workingclass support was mobilised. The closer and more regular the links between the workers' movement in South Africa and overseas, the more possible it becomes to organise common action.

South African workers preparing for future struggles should develop and strengthen existing links, and seek new points of contact with the workers in other countries. For our comrades abroad, the task is to gather support for these efforts while building bridges from their own side towards greater international unity.

Fraternal links

An excellent example has been provided by the Coventry South-East branch of the British Labour Party, which put forward a number of proposals to the British Anti-Apartheid Movement for developing greater support for the South African workers' struggle. These included proposals that the Anti-Apartheid Movement should support the development of fraternal links between South African and British workers—factory-to-factory links, exchange visits between workers' representatives, and the forming of international combine committees (i.e. committees of shop stewards representing all workers employed by the same multinationals).

These proposals are finding widespread acceptance among the active layers of the British labour movement and have been adopted, for example, by the youth wing of the Labour Party (the Labour Party Young Socialists). An increased awareness of the struggle in South increased a n and preparedness to join forces with the South African workers will be the

Regrettably, the Executive of the Anti-Apartheid Movement has taken up a different position. In reply to the proposals by the Coventry South-East Labour Party, the AAM Executive arrives at the following conclusion:

"...we do not feel that the AAM should assist in encouraging direct links between British and South African workers, when this is understood to mean the creation of international combine committees and exchange visits". (Memo dated 27.6.81)

Direct links, the AAM Executive declares, "can provoke further harassment and in other ways jeopardise (South African) trade unionists' work". This is just like opposing a withdrawal of investment from South Africa because it could "jeopardise" South African workers' jobs. The point of trade union activity, is to build up the forces with which "harassment" can be resisted—including powerful links with our class allies abroad.

The AAM Executive further believes that visits to South Africa, also by trade unionists to meet their fellow-workers. should discouraged because "there is no need to visit South Africa in order to know the facts about apartheid."

This is presumably a reference to the fact that leading right-wing trade union officials have madeand continue to make—so-called "fact-finding missions" to South Africa when their real aim is to defend British investments in that country or to use their influence to obstruct or damp down the militan-

Clearly, we must resolutely oppose and expose such activities, and join with our fellow workers in the trade union movement in Britain and elsewhere who are struggling to replace the right-wing leaders with genuine class fighters committed to socialism. But it is a dangerously misguided policy to try to counter the activities of the right-wingers by means of a blanket ban on all contact with South African workers.

That would prevent the vital union-to-union, factory-to-factory and worker-to-worker links which are the life-giving oxygen of international solidarity. You might as well have a 'health policy' of throttling people in order to 'save' them from breathing in pollution with their air supply!

The AAM Executive opposes international combine committees and factory-to-factory links because they are "difficult" and "in South African conditions can be dangerous in the extreme." But on this basis, should not all other aspects of trade union activity in South Africa be opposed as well, as being "difficult" and "dangerous"?!

It is the task of the workers' teadership in all countries to fight against wrong ideas and tactics that will hold the struggle back. Undoubtedly the ideas of the AAM Executive—if they find any support—would disrupt the building of international solidarity and weaken the South African workers' movement.

SACTU

Fraternal links with the South African working class, the AAM Executive believes, should be limited solely to links with the South African Congress of Trade Unions (SACTU).

Many workers will expect a revolutionary lead on the question of solidarity from SACTU, whose exile leaders have had many years to develop, test and refine policies for building the most effective links of struggle with the workers' movement overseas.

Unfortunately the mistaken position of the AAM Executive is only a faithful reflection of that which is now being put forward by SACTU's exile leadership itself.

The development towards an international outlook in the pages of Workers' Unity between 1977 and 1979 has been completely reversed. This change of direction was spelled out in an article in Workers' Unity (March 1980) dealing with solidarity between British and South African workers.

The article declares that "the solidarity of British workers with their fellow-workers is vital to our struggle..." Yet, as a practical example, it is proudly mentioned that SACTU leaders prevented two British shop stewards from visiting their South African fellow-workers at the request of an unregistered trade union involved in a recognition dispute!

To workers in South Africa fighting to build international support, such action may seem inexplicable. Why do the SACTU leaders, in the name of 'international solidarity', propose cutting off links between workers in South Africa and Britain?

The reason is a somewhat shortsighted-and in our view unnecessary—anxiety on the part of these leading comrades to have SACTU recognised internationally as the sole trade union 'representative' of the South African workers.

In reality, comrades, there is no way to gain such recognition in this day and age except by plunging into the real struggle of the mass of the workers inside South Africa and by placing SACTU in the actual forefront of the class battles that are exploding every day. ...

Ingaba has urged, and would support every step towards, a real effort by the SACTU leadership to build underground foundations within the workers' movement at home, on the basis of socialist policies. And that very effort, once begun, would immediately reveal to the SACTU leaders the vital necessity of every possible link and mutual support between the rank-and-file workers and their class brothers and sisters in other countries.

Therefore it is all the more tions as a reason against direct worker links that "the struggle ... in South Africa cannot be waged in Europe. It must be brought to a successful conclusion by the workers themselves where the struggle exists—in South Africa!" To the extent that this is true, we would have thought it was an argument for links of solidarity to be forged directly with the places where the struggle exists!

No substitute

Obviously the decisive role in ending South African capitalism will be played by the South African workers. At the same time the workers' struggle cannot be, and is not, confined to South Africa. This is because of the international nature of the capitalist system.

The point is precisely that the class struggle is not confined to any single country but "exists" between the world-wide forces of capitalism and the world-wide army of labour. South Africa forms one front in this struggle; it cannot be separated from the struggle as a whole.

The present SACTU position, on the other hand, seems to treat the South African struggle as if it were separate. The labour and trade union movement internationally is viewed as an 'outside' body, to be asked for support on the basis of sympathy, but with no concern in its own right in the fate of the South African revolution.

This approach leads to all sorts of errors. We wonder whether the comrade of SACTU's National Executive Committee was reflecting a properly thought-out position when he addressed a meeting of British trade unionists at the recent TUC Conference (which represents 12 million organised workers). "We need nothing from you," he said, "all we need is money."

This was in reply to a question on the need for direct links with the South African trade union movement.

Solidarity by British workers, according to this view, should be confined to financial donations and "applying the maximum pressure on the (British) parent companies." (Workers' Unity, March 1980). strange that Workers' Unity men- 1. There should be no contact with the South African workers, no direct consultation to co-ordinate action and decide what "pressure" to app-side the country, the SACTU speaker at the TUC Conference suggested, could take the form of taperecorded messages from British trade union leaders. But, Workers' Unity insists, British trade unions should avoid the "easy (?) solution of sending officials to South Africa or "inviting" this or that trade unionist (??) to come from South Africa."

Instead, contact should only take place with exile SACTU officials themselves.

That cannot be correct. Nor, we think, is it adequate to ask the trade unions overseas to pay over to SAC-TU all donations towards supporting strikes in South Africa, on the argument that this is the best means of getting the money through to the SA workers.

SACTU would have to undergo a truly massive development underground in South Africa before its links with the 200 000 workers in the independent trade unions would be equal to such a task.

Inqaba calls for full support for SACTU by the labour movement internationally in any work towards building a revolutionary trade union underground. But we do not believe this this should be an alternative or substitute for massive direct support for the independent trade unions working openly inside South Africa.

The government's restrictions on trade unions receiving funds must not be tamely accepted, but met if necessary with a head-on challenge, involving the maximum strength of the labour movement internationally.

Nor does 'solidarity' mean simply 'support for the South African workers'. Working-class solidarity, in Lenin's words, means that "the workers fight jointly against international capital"—i.e., struggle together on all fronts.

Joint organisation

Yet how can this struggle be organised, except through contact between representatives of the active rank and file, a constant exchange of views on aims, strategy and tactics, and the fight to develop joint organs where the necessary consultation and decision-making can take place—however long this might take and however "difficult" it might be?

A wrong position on these issues can only disrupt the painstaking efforts by workers inside the country to broaden their struggle internationally. We urge the SACTU leadership to reconsider its position before serious damage is done.

Sanctions must be directed against the bosses and their regime. Real, concrete solidarity must be established between the workers.

Fortunately, the abovementioned mistaken policies are meeting with growing rejection wherever they are openly debated, and have failed to prevent increasing contact between workers in South Africa and abroad.

Militant workers in South Africa, Britain and all countries will continue to strengthen their links with each other as a necessary weapon in the fight against capitalism.

South African workers should insist on determined efforts by their leaders—both in the country and in exile—to open up new areas of contact and co-operation with the working-class movement internationally. We must struggle against all attempts at obstruction by the bosses, the state, as well as by misguided attitudes within our own organisations. There is no other way to defeat the monster of international capitalist reaction.

INQABA YA BASEBENZI ("Workers' Fortress") is being published because of the need for a conscious socialist voice in the movement of the workers and youth. Immense tasks face us, both in the trade unions and in the ANC.

Today it is vital to link together those in the movement who, on the basis of experience and events, can explain to their fellow-strugglers the need for socialist policies. INQABA will help to assemble the facts and present the arguments in support of this task.

The bosses control the press, the radio and the television. Daily they use it to defend their class interests against the masses, making propaganda and suppressing the truth.

Our class needs its own papers in which all the problems of our life are honestly discussed—industrial disputes, migrant labour and the pass laws, unemployment, education, housing and transport, police terrorism, the manoeuvres of the regime. We need our own publications where we can argue for the programme, strategy and tactics needed to overthrow the enemy.

Make INQABA your own journal. Discuss it with your comrades. Use it to express your own experiences, agreements and disagreements. Use it to expose the things the bosses and the regime keep quiet about.

Write about the daily struggles of life in the townships and workplaces. Write about national and international issues. Send articles, letters, photographs, cartoons, reviews—whatever you want to bring to the attention of your comrades in the struggle all over the country.

Those who have no safer way of contacting INQABA or of passing material on to us, can use the following postal address: BM Box 1719, London WC1N 3XX.
